Colleagues of Mr Keith Hampson, the Conservative MP for Leeds North West, were saddened yesterday by the news of his resignation as parliamentary private secretary to Mr Michael Heseltine, the Secretary Olympic official fails of State for Defence, and mystified by the circumstances surrounding it.

His resignation was offered and accepted in a telephone conversation with Mr Heseltine at lunchtime on Saturday, a few hours after the minister had learnt of Mr Hampson's arrest II days ago for allegedly making an indecent assault on a plainclothes policeman in a London male strip club.

Mr Heseltine had been informed of the alleged incident at about 9.15am on Saturday by Ministry's press department. who had been contacted by the Sunday Telegraph and told about the arrest, which took place in the Gay Theatre, in

Mr Heselune, Government officials were damant yesterday that there were no security implications in the affair. The Government, however, will be asked why Mr Heselune was not informed sooner. It was pointed out that Mr Hampson could have told him, and had not done so, but some MPs were saying that it was wrong and embarrassing that the Government should apparently have found out as a result of newspaper inquiries. Scotland Yard said yesterday that there was no "formal channel" for informing government departments if MPs were

The predominant feeling among MPs yesterday was one of shock and sympathy at the predicament of Mr Hampson, who is highly popular in the House of Commons.

Mr Hampson, aged 40 and married, was alleged to have indecently assaulted a plainclothes policeman from Scot-land Yard's club squad who was on duty with a woman colleague. He was arrested, taken to a police station and released pending a report to the Metropolitan Police solicitors' department. He was not charged. Mr Hampson said that he had resigned to avoid embarrassment to Mr Heseltine and the Government because of personal problems resulting from one night a week or so ago when I was totally fed up and drank far too much.

Jobs worry for Scots Tories By Ronald Faux

Looming behind the rousing pledges that government policy was "winning through" were three issues causing unease among Scottish Conservatives at their conference in Perth at the weekend.

The first was that central Scotland seems likely to be hit soon by further unemployment if, as expected, the Leyland truck factory at Bathgate closes with the loss of 1,750 jobs.

Secondly, the Government admitted that it has failed to impress voters with its achievements and is unable to stop bad economic news from drowning the good. All the Prime Minister could do was to encourage individual enterprise, point optimistically at the growing number of foreign firms setting up in Scotland and admit that she could not say when the next opening in the market place would come.

Worst of all was the result of the recent local elections in Scotland, when the Conservatives were severely defeated. There are achievements for which the Conservatives believe they should be more widely congratulated: action against Vosper.

That could leave the council reasurer. Mr Michael Reddington, with the task of persuading City of London institutions and banks to renew loans in the absence of income from rates as

If he failed and had to repay loans with the revenue Liverpool is still receiving from rents and government grants, the district auditor would be likely to intervene.

The courts might rule such payments illegal and either force the council to levy a rate or begin procedures that could lead to the disqualification from proved the payments - the Labour leaders.

One irony of Liverpool's unprecedented financial position is that until this week the council's cash flow has been healthier than it might have been if a rate had been set.
The Department of the

Another house owner, who moved to a Victorian terrace house in a housing action area in Hackney, east London - which should receive some priority - is still waiting after nearly a year of negotiations with the council for a grant of about £10,000, for which he is eligible, to add to the £30,000 he is prepared to spend to renovate the house to a high standard. His application was held up by the council's failure to send the formal application docu-ments, and his attempts to improve the house - for himself and the sake of the area - have been obstructed by administrative delays.

Home improvement grants have increased dramatically in the past five years with the active encouragement of the Government, Now the Government has turned the tap off by reducing the maximum available for a grant, and many local authorities have called a half to new grants. CHRISTOPHER WARMAN, Property Correspondent, describes now the policy has come unstuck.

These examples illustrate the

"hit and miss" system of home

During the past few years the Government has given strong encouragement to local authorities to spend as much of their housing allocations as possible on renovation grants and has stimulated public demand for such grants as a means of improving the housing stock.

The incentive was increased in 1982 when the Government lost its housing action status raised grants to 90 per cent, but because of the council's failure that has now been reduced housing allocations for local authorities. The higher rate still change the Government would be concentrating the limited amount of taxpayers' money on those in greatest need.

He said: "The maintenance

ing stock is of the greatest longterm importance for all of us. But taxpayers' money is not.

He emphasized that the private sector as well as the public sector, had a responsibility, and pointed out that in the 1970s spending on improvements and repairs to privately owned housing from loans or savings was estimated to be 30 times more than from grants.

The fact is that after stimulating demand, the Government is turning off the tap, leaving long permission for new grants in

Dr Billy Graham began his summer campaign in England with two mass meetings at the Bristol football stadium at the weekend, each time drawing about 2,000 people to "come forward" to signify their conversion.

That was hailed by the organizers as an exceptional response. Saturday's crowd was estimated at 31,000 and yesterday's at 25,000. Credit card firms urged to pay Laker fare bills

Sir Gordon Borrie, Director General of Fair Trading, has stepped into a long-running over reimbursing travellers who lost money in the colapse of Laker Airways.

He is pressing particularly Barclaycard, the credit card subsidiary of Barclays Bank to accept full legal liability for losses where credit card payment was involved.

More than two years after the Laker collapse, about 2,700 loss claims, amounting to about 51m, are believed to be outstanding from an initial 52,600 claims involving about 59m. Perhaps half of the outstanding claims involve credit card transactions.

Many earlier claims have transaction. It was only at the been met by travel industry beginning of last month that bonding arrangements or the Barclaycard said it would now Air Travel Reserve Fund, which steps in when bonds deposited. by a tour operator prove insufficient to meet losses.

tour operators' group wanted the card companies to meet what it saw as their legal obligations under the Consumer Credit Act, which lays a liability on card companies where suppliers of goods or services

The card companies argued that payments should come first from the travel industry's bonding and other arrange-ments specifically set up to protect travellers.

One of Sir Gordon's anxieties is that, if the situation cannot be clarified, travellers affected by a travel company collapse in the future could be even more exposed. There have been increasing worries that there might be too big a drain on the reserve fund's resources.

Barclaycard has made one new move. It is renegotiating terms with tour operators on card payments for holidays, insisting that the operators should have approved insurance cover to ensure cardholders are reimbursed for any

Parent management Banker's inquest of schools proposed

Proposals to hand over the management of state-funded schools to boards of elected parents are published today by the Adam Smith Institute.

The institute's report supports speculation that the Government is considering measures to increase competition, selection and independence of schools within the state sector. Its document is known to be close to ministerial thinking.

The institute suggests that new boards, with a majority of parents and non-voting seats for the head teachers, teachers and local community representatives, would have broad powers to decide school curriculum, disciplinary measures and teachers' salaries.

The most radical proposal is for schools to be financed through a fixed grant for each pupil attending the school. Schools would be free to recruit new pupils and compete for applications from parents for their child to enter a preferred

The institute says it would mean less successful schools having a "considerable incentive to raise standards and reduce costs in order to attract students". Schools with particular problems would get "small" additional grants above the grant for each pupil. How the money was spent would be up to parents, with national minimum standards in cleaning, maintenance, catering and teaching performance.

The report's ideas have become popular among the "radical right" as a way of restoring what it calls "consuner sovereignty" in edu-cation. The institute argues that the "consumers" of edu-cation, parents, children and employers, have almost no say in the service.

Owen attacks Trident 'millstone' on defence

Conservative policies would inevitably lead to a cut in European defence expenditure in real terms by 1986-87, Dr David Owen, leader of the SDP, told the Council for Social Democracy meeting in Edinburgh. The Government, he said, was forecasting only a 0.5 per cent rise in expenditure on European conven-tion defences, and that was based on tion defences, and that was based on its assumption of only 3 per cent inflation, a most unlikely figure.

"I believe what we are destined to see by 1986-87 is a defence budget that is actually declining in real terms, because if inflation goes above 3.4 per cent there will be an absolute cut in the defence budget". he said in the opening debate on

"That is not a contribution this country ought to be making to the greater conventional strength of the European countries. That is not the way to achieve less reliance on nuclear weapons or to take a first step towards a no first use of nuclear weapons strategy. Nor is it the way to ensure peace and prosperity in Europe.
"Why is that happening? The reason is the Trident programme which is now banging like a millstone around the neck of this

The estimate of the cost of Trident was £9,500m, but taking but not to amend, the joint statement agreed with the Liberal likely inflation into account it would probably be nearer £11,500m. The Government claimed Tri-dent amounted to only a small proportion of the entire defence budget, some 3 per cent, but it was a crucial factor amounting to some 7.5 per cent of all military spending in the years at the end of Eighties and the beginning of the Nineues. Expenditure on Trident could be achieved only at a damaging price in terms of conventional defence. Although he would like to see the savings from the cancellation of Trident channelled to the health services, some part would have to

"If you wnt European security on conventional weapons you cannot afford an all-singing, an all-dancing Trident super-power nuclear deterent, he said.

A high proportion of Cardmembers travel regularly by air. American Express reaches out to them and to prospects through its unique SkyGuide* service. This makes publicly available through Prestel virtually up-to-the minute flight arrival and departure information from the 12 leading UK international airports.

SkyGuide works 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. It monitors some 700,000 aircraft movements a year, covering around 57 million passengers. Prestel subscribers can access this valuable information for just 10p plus the cost of a local telephone call. And they are currently doing so 100,000 times a month.

The ingenious SkyGuide programme has won awards from the British Computer Society for applications, and from the European Direct Marketing Association for an outstanding contribution to the direct marketing of high-tech products.

It enables the American Express viewdata computer in Brighton to monitor and reproduce in a standard format, flight information that appears in disparate forms at each airport. Both data integrity and overall cost dictated

Although names were not given yesterday, it is reliably understood that the name of one of the two Arabs whose body has been exhumed is Majdi Abu Jumaa, aged 18, who was pictured by a photographer from Hadashot being led alive and well from the bs in the custody of two security men in civilian clothing.

The dramatic photograph, which is of good quality and shows apparent head wounds on the hijacker, has never been published in Israel itself, because of the ban imposed by the military censor, whose edicts have ruled out the publication of any details about the fate of the two hijackers.

Abu Jumaa, along with the other three hijackers, was buried under Army supervision on the night of Sunday, April 15. in the Gaza Strip. His body was identified by an uncle who claimed later that the head was covered in matted blood, although no such wounds were visible in the photograph taken as he left the bus.

It has been evident for some time that Pasok was not the old Centre Union. The strongly anti-Communist coalition pieced together by Mr Papandreou's own father in the early 1960's to dislodge the right wing which had firmly entrenched itself in power after the war.

Mr Papandreou himself told the congress that Pasok, in the absence of a socialist tradition in this country, had its roots in EAM the Communist-con-trolled wartime National Liberation Front. After the war, EAM was denied its rightful political role because the Communist uprising and the right wing oppression on that ensude left little room for ideological nuances. These frustrated

US attack on Soviet boycott

From Mohsin Ali Washington

Mr George Shultz, the US Secretary of State, has attacked many places throughout the Philippines before polling the Soviet Union sharply for its withdrawal from the Los Angeles Olympics and its treat-ment of Dr Andrei Sakharov, making a dent in the well-oiled the dissident physicist,

"The Soviet decision to boycott the Los Angeles Olympics was completely unjustified. It surprised and clearly dis-mayed even their closest allies," Mr Sbultz told a business council in Hot Springs, Virginia on Saturday.

Mr Shultz commented that the allegations on which the Russians ostensibly based their decision were filmsy and false". He added that the United States had met all its obligations under the Olympic charter and had bent over backwards to meet the Russians' legitimate concerns. Those included assurances that there would be no anti-Soviet demonstrations in the Olympic facilities and villages. and the granting of permission for charter flights by the Soviet airline, Aeroflot.

Mr Shultz said that the Russians were trying to "drag their allies into isolation with them" by forcing them to boycott the games.

He also criticized the Soviet decision to walk out of the nuclear arms control talks late

After Dr Sakharov tried to help his wife to go the West for medical treatment the Russians cut him off from the outside world, bringing false charges against his wife and even refusing to allow her to go to Moscow, His life was being trifled with and the whole world must be concerned. Mr Shultz

New attitude to food production

Why the rising price of rice has sown the seeds of capitalism

In the first of three articles on licenam, David Watts, South-East Asia Correspondent de-scribes how the need to grow more rice has made ideological purity a less immediate con-

Professor Tran Phuong smiles mischievously as he admits that good old-fashioned capitalism is playing an important role in the rehabilitation of Vietnamese agricul-

Contract incentive schemes have improved rice production by about 50 per cent since they were introduced and there are tentative efforts to offer the same extra rewards on the industrial side of the economy. Professor Phuong, who is vice-chairman of the council of ministers in charge of economic policy, believes it is perfectly acceptable to use such individualistic methods to encourage socialist production: "In peace time we should have material incentives and expand piecework wages to pay people according to production. Any effort above the quota gets better pay. It's a policy every country applies in peace time. The policy during war time was abnormal.

Thirty years of war left Vietnamese agriculture exhausted or destroyed with half a million hectares uncultivated and with a formerly extensive rice exporter reduced to being a chronically dependent importer from the United States. Since 1975 the need to get basic food production up to self-sufficiency levels has persuaded those with a more pragmatic outlook to try methods which are anathema to large sections of the Communist Party of Vietnam.

By the end of last year the pragmatists had the upper hand, at least for the moment. with rice production at 17 million tons - sufficient to feed the country at the low levels of nutrition to which Vietnam has become accustomed.

The victory had been at a price of division within the party. And criticism that the incentives, which allow peasants and cooperatives to retain excess production for their own use or resale, have contributed to corruption.

This spring the paddy fields of the Red River delta are a vivid green giving hopes of a good spring crop. But appearances are misleading: an unusually severe winter had played havoc with the last of the 1983 crop and there is already a shortage of rice on the free market on which so many Vietnamese rely. The price of rice is sky-rocketing with the better varieties costing as much as 60 dong kilogramme. The price had previously been running at about 25 dong a kilo. In the VIETNAM get varying monthly rice allowances at half a dong a kilo depending on their status.

To make up shortages in the north, however, is problematic. Rice production in the porthern half of the country is still under-developed but to bring rice from the country's rice bowl in the Nekong delta is vastly expensive and there is a lack of transport infrastructure. One senior party cadre said one kilo of rice produced in the north was better than 20 imported from the south. So despite markets full of fresh tomatoes and bananas in Hanoi, inflation is rampant and the prospect is that Vietnam will have to import some 200.000 tons of rice during the

But the professor is adamant that these capitalist practices pose no danger to socialism: "Categorically no." he says with a wry smile; "Officially no capitalists remain. We require managers of big factries to have joint enterprises with the state but we may say that there are small capitalists. We allow them to have up to 15 workers because we believe they are useful to the economy. They are useful in the sense that they can manufacture a variety of products that the state factories can't."

As you'll be, when you're behind the wheel.

The Volvo driver's seat is orthopaedically designed, and has an adjustable lumbar support plate.

This makes it soft and comfortable, yet firm enough to provide the support you need on a long journey.

A built-in heating element switches itself on when the temperature drops below 14°C, making chilly morning starts a degree or two more pleasant.

You'll also appreciate the sensible layout of the controls and instrument panel (no stretching or craning).

As well as the 14 air outlets, with which you can direct hot or cold air wherever you need it.

And the central locking with which you can lock the other doors without ricking your back.

Comforting though these details are, however, they're only part of the story.

Our aim is to create an environment in which you're completely comfortable and relaxed.

We've added a fifth gear, which greatly reduces the engine speed when cruising.

Engine stress and noise are reduced, and so is the stress on you. And the car's power steering makes getting in and out of tight

There can be no doubt that this preconception makes it all and Italy are known to be the more difficult for Mrs dragging their feet Thatcher to negotiable with her naturally abrasive style. Britain is not so much plaintiff in the case as a defendant in the dock.

This last week saw Mr Nicholas Ridley, the Transport Minister, launching another well-prepared campaign to slash the exorbitant price of Euro-pean air fares. It is a popular campaign with the European public, even if it is anathema to many member states who are frightened to open their national flag carriers to price competition. Mr Ridley tried to make out it was just coincidence that British Airways and KLM between them had agreed to slash London-Amsterdam resiash London-Amsterdam re-turn fares to just £49, even though he must have been aware of the negotiations which made it all possible. But with the prospect of a price war in the air, the Transport Council did agree (at last) to set up a working group 1.5 study liberalizing air services and it may even report back by the end of the year. That is further than Britain itself was able to go when it was last in the EEC council chair, even though it had made the question one of its urgent priorities.

Transport generally is a subject where Britain is very keen to show how European it is. It is not very expensive to the budget and supporting mea-sures like cheaper fares and

And if Britain is not being slow to draw attention to the way other countries hold up other European projects (West Germany refusing to liberalize insurance services is a favourite British example) it is also doing its best to point out that it is one of the more law-abiding of all member states.

This is an argument made the easier by the decision not to withhold contributions to the EEC budget in retaliation for failure to pay Britain its rebate according to the timetable Mrs. Thatcher had set.

It is also made easier by recent Commission figures (being proudly circulated by British officals in Brussels) which show that Britain has been hauled before the Euroeasier border crossings are popular with the public.

"People spoke to us of two to three thousand political pris-oners still being held, nostly in the most appalling conditions, including many lawyers who have spoken out against martial law, but we were not able to verify that figure", Maitre Etienne Jaudel, one of the french lawyers, said in Paris

"Things got paricularly bad after the bloody riots last summer. It is the extraordinarily arbitrary nature of the arrests that is the worst. People may be arrested anywhere, at any time, and sentenced to up to three years imprisonment by summary military tribunals without ever knowing the charges against them and with no right to any legal representation. We met people who had been arrested and sentenced in times in succession.

"The detention centre in the Mogul fort in Lahore has the worst reputation for the forture of political prisoners. Tamil prisoners call for release of US couple

A search was being conducted yesterday by the Army, Navy, Air Force and police in the northern province and 13 islands for the American couple, Mr Stanley Bryson Allen and his wife, Mary Efizabeth, who were kidnapped by Tamil rebels. The rebels have threatened to kill them by noon today if their demands for the release of 20 prisoners and 50 million of 20 prisoners and 50 million rupees in gold (£1.4m) are not met through the Tamil Nadu Government in Madras.

Eventually, every successful man finds himself on the horns of a dilemma.

Should he indulge himself with all the creature comforts of an executive limousine, or should he buy a car that lets out the beast in him?

As far as Toyota can see, there's no reason why he shouldn't do both.

Because, for such a shamelessly luxurious saloon, the new Camry GLi is wickedly quick.

It has a 1995cc fuel injected engine capable of taking you from 0 to criminal status faster than you can say 'officer.'

If you provoke it, it's quite happy to pin you back in your seat at 116 mph.

And with ventilated front discs, plus front wheel drive and fully independent suspension, you'll stay firmly clamped to the tarmac, no matter how many G'a you're tempted to pull on the bends.

To keep you comfortable while you wrestle with temptation, we've made the Camry decadently luxurious.

Power assisted steering, wall-to-wall carpeting, electric windows all round, electric sun roof, central locking, 3-band FM stereo cassette and so much room inside you could almost move in.

The Carnry GLi is the lap of luxury.

Be warned though, it performs like it's doing laps at Brands Hatch.

So you'd have to be a saint not to put your foot down from time to time.

And that's the best way we know to make the boys in blue see red.

Divorce – American style

The Government's divorce reform proposals have been fiercely debated in and outside Parliament during the past few months. The Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Bill, at present in committee stage, aims to reform the present maintenance and alimony system to end the so-called "meal ticket for life" and to protect children's interests. This emphasis on financial self-sufficiency for wives, which has been opposed by single parent groups in this country, has been one of the main planks of divorce law in the United States since the mid-1970s. BAILEY MORRIS reports on the array of problems that has emerged with the changes?

Washington

and that we were

These are the worst of times for lenry and Diane Mistele, who despite being legally divorced are living logether by order of a United States court. How this bizarre state of affairs came about is a story which could be written only in America, where attempts have been made for where attempts have been made for more than a decade to correct inequities caused by the widespread adoption of "no-fault" divorce laws.

In the widely-publicized case of the Misteles, a well-meaning but misguided judge in Detroit, Michigan, tined to dely the unwritten rules of a broken marriage he sentencing them, for the sake of their children, to four years of "togetherness". Under the years of "togetherness". Under the terms of this unique, even freakish decision. Mr Mistele is responsible for the maintenance of a comfortable house in the expensive Grosse Pointe Woods area of Deirori, as well as for grocery money and $400 (£285) a month alimony. Mrs Mistele is responsible for cooking, housekeeping, shopping and childcare.

He sleeps in the bedroom; she sleeps in the sitting-room. Neither is allowed to bring "dates" home. If either breaks the rules, the penalty is inss of custody of their three sons. Both have denounced the judge and the are lighting the decision.

One result has been the creation of a new poverty class

As Britain embarks on its first AS DITIAM EMPLANA ON 160 IT IS reform of divorce law since 1969, it is useful to examine, not the terms of district to examine, not the terms of the Mistele decision, but the motives which prompted the attempt of 78-year-old Detroit judge David Vokes to hold together a marriage that had broken down-mervocably

A careful reading of the decision suggests that he saw Diane Missele as "Everywoman" of a certain age and economic background who is likely to slip through the cracks of no-fault divorce laws which no longer guarantee lifetime support. She is over 40, and has not worked since her three sons - aged 14 to 16 - were born. She is one generation of women who accepted the social dictum that a woman's place was at home. To push her out into society with only a modest property settlement, outdated skills and prospects of only a very low-paying job would be to doom her to a life very close to the poverty line

This, at any rate, was the judge's thinking, based on 20 years of hearing divorce cases. His experience taught him - and US statistics show - that since the widespread adoption of no-fault divorce laws in 1970; first the rate of divorce has increased (one in two US marriages is legally dissolved): second terms have changed (child support payments and other forms of financial assistance have decreased); and third, one unfortunate result had been the creation of a new class of poor families headed by single, working women. The growth of this new poverty class is thought to be a generational phenomenon will not occur among younger, better-educated women whose career prospects are brighter. For the moment, however, it is a class that imposes new hurdens on society and poses challenges to individual courts in the 51 state jurisdictions. They must put into practice specific terms of legal principles that are stated only in general terms.

In the 44 states which now require equitable distribution of marital property, it is up to the courts to decide what goes into the pot and how it should be divided. How much value should be placed, for example, on mothering, housekeeping, hostessing and other intangibles? Should the lost career potential of a foreign service wife or woman who stayed at home be taken into consideration? May a wife make claim to her husband's share of a closely-held business or to future royalties on a book written during the

As property settlements go up, and awards of alimony go down - only 10 per cent of US divorcees now receive such payments - These are the new issues courts are asked to resolve. There is no uniform response. Only 30 states, for example, weigh the economic value of housework, which has been estimated at figures varying from $100 to $300 a week.

Pensions are also a burning issue. In marriages in which the husbands pension was one of the main assets, wives have pressed for their share, but the practice of splitting pensions was recently interrupted by a contro-versial. Supreme Court decision which declared in a case involving retirement pay of railway workers, that pensions may not be assigned to anyone but the worker. The court has not yet ruled on a similar case involving private pensions. It could terminate altogether the practice of pension-splitting unless Congress passes new legislation

This "lotal picture" approach to divorce settlements has created a new breed of economic specialists who earn fees of $5,000 and more to place valuations, which will stand up in court, on a medical accountancy business and the like. In some acrimonious cases, platoons of competing specialists are employed to help divide the spoils, thus raising the cost of litigation enormously.

The excesses that have grown up under the no-fault system have led to repeated calls for reform. State legislators and associations of trial lawyers have appealed for national. standardized, methods of evaluating the net worth of businesses and professions so as to cut divorce intigation fees, Increasingly, too, there are calls for government regulations. either state or federal, to set standards for divorce clinics in order to climinate the assembly-line type. which encourages couples to slip in and out of marriage with ease.

But generally, it must be said that the principles guiding courts since the adoption of no-fault divorce laws are laudable, and preferable to the former system of protracted court battles and lifetime alimony support. They are: that property be divided fairly: that children be supported by one parent or both parents, depending on the means of each: that whenever possible alimony be eliminated, or alternatively be of a temporary nature, to encourage the ex-wife or ex-husband to support himself or herself.

In practice, however, the system often fails. Despite court awards and the concern of officials, frequently neither child support nor alimony is awarded were smaller. Perhaps more disturbing was the finding that more than one-half of the 8.4 million women living with children under 21, in families in which no father was present received no support at all.

Studies reveal that divorce is harder on boys than girls

These grim statistics add up to a national problem which President Reagan mentioned in a State of the Union message this year in which he promised increased federal efforts to help mothers collect payments to bolster the deteriorating family structure.

Reagan is considering the use of computers to track down non-paying spouses - usually fathers - who attempt to go underground by changing their names or seeking employment in other states. Under this proposal, the names of non-pay-ing fathers or mothers would be forwarded to the inland revenue service, which would deduct from federal tax refunds the money owed.

This will not however, be enough to correct the problems faced by the children of divorce. Many, who formerly lived with both parents in middle-class homes, experience rapid deterioration in their standards of living. Support payments increasingly cease well before the age of 21, leaving the mother to pay for vocational training and university education she can rarely afford.

Economic sacrifices are only part of the problem. There are deep emotional scars as well. Despite the growing acceptance of shared physical and legal custody of children, and a new movement by fathers to gain custody, courts continue overwhelmingly to award the care of children to mothers. Often, in several years time, or after remarriage, the father drops out of the children's lives completely.

This is disastrous for boys in vorced people's families. New divorced people's families. New studies reveal that divorce is harder on boys than girls, who adjust more rapidly, often recovering from the shock in a year's time, whereas it can take a boy up to three years to recover.

As the effects on children have become better researched, courts and parents have tried to find better ways of preserving their interests. This has led to experiments known as the "empty nester" syndrome, in which both parents retain custody of children, each parent taking turns to visit: and a shared custody regime in which children shuttle back and forth. Courts in cases where children become pawns in the divorce proceedings have also begun to appoint independent child counsellors or watchdogs to protect their rights. These are some of the problems during the past decade of no fault divorce. Well-meaning judges like the

Frances Gibb on a hollow legal victory

Winner loses all

When Patnera Eaton, a South London college lecturer, won £12.000 libel damages last year against her former lover in the so-called "sex blackmail" case, colleagues and friends thought she had done rather well. The award and the £20,000 legal costs ordered against art lecturer Terry Horsley seemed some kind of compensation for three years of the emotional turmoil and strain-that is always likely to attend litigation, particularly where reputation is concerned. But it is victory that has turned distinctly sour as far as

Miss Eaton is concerned. To this day, the sum total she has received from Mr Horsley is £000, most of which has gone to her solicitor, and she still faces debts of some £12,000, the amount outstanding from the legal costs incurred in clearing Libel actions, while attracting much publicity, are relatively rare. Those that are brought represent only a small percentage of cases where there may be grounds for an action but where the victim is deterred from litigation because of the immense obstacles involved. And of those writs that are issued, 95 per cent are settled out of court. Unlike every other kind of civil action. libel does not qualify for legal aid. So any would-be litigant must, if not wealthy, at least have access to funds running to several thousand pounds. And the onus of proof is on the person summ, he must show the words were defamatory. Third, again unlike other civil actions, juries are results unpredictable. Despite these obstacles. Miss Eaton, a lecturer in movement studies and health education, went ahead with her action after an 18-month affair with Mr Horsley at Avery Hill College of Further Education where they both worked. She claimed that a letter to the college head by him had severely damaged her personal and professional repuiation. Copies of the letter were circulated to other staff mem-

The case, which came to court last February, had all the neredients guaranteed to attract maximum press interest; with the consequent harassment and invasion of privacy that

Patricia Eaton: awarded £12,000, still owes £12,000

When the jury came out unequivocally in Miss Eaton's favour, her decision to fight in the courts seemed vindicated. But it was the judge, in summing up, who prophetically warned that there could be "no winners, only losers", at the end

"She argues that she had no choice but to sue. "The hurt I feel most", she says, "is that no used which can make the one mentions my attempts to stop this ever reaching the courts." As far back as October Mr Horsley, saying she would settle for an apology and £25 costs. Three years later, with all attempts to settle out of court having failed. Mr Horsley faced finding £32,000. Further legal action became necessary to secure regular payments of the money. By this ume however Miss Eaton, who had already raised £7.000 with help from friends to bring the case, was out of cash. Her solicitor, who had paid all the money to her counsel, could not longer act for her without paying out of his own pocket.

So when the crunch came last October, "the day, before my fiftieth birthday", she had to fight unaided. Mr Horsley, who had been forced to take out a second mortgage on his home to fight the libel case, declared himself bankrupt and Miss Eaton was in effect his only unsecured creditor.

Last month she sought to contest the bankruptcy move. Her application was dismissed. 'How is it", she asks, "that judgment can be awarded in 1980, her lawyers had written to one's favour and the other party, who does not pay, can become bankrupt and I end up not only without the money but paying more?"

> The tale is a cautionary one. With legal aid not currently available, would-be litigants face a hard choice: endure possible permanent damage to reputation and livelihood: or risk thousands of pounds in seeking to vindicate them. And without any state compensation fund to help in such cases as Miss Eaton's, as some lawvers even the winner can

TALKBACK Teacher

From Lisa Hallgarten, Antrim Grove, London. With reference to headmaster John Pearman's "Comment" (Monday Page, May 7), I would like to comment on the role and performance of Britain's teach ers from a different perspective. As a student in a large London comprehensive, I reject totally the idea that teachers under estimate their responsibility to their pupils. My long experience as a pupil has shown me the great extent of my teachers concern both in their time spent in preparation and marking and in their acceptance of much unnaid ovetime. It is precisely because teaching is a caring profession that, like nurses, teachers can be exploited financially through their own genuine concern, and the public outery that inevitably follows strike threats.

Finally, to claim that teachers are "unaccountable" is to insult the very intelligence of school Most students know if a teacher is lazy, inefficient or indifferent to their needs, and l would put it to John Pearman that the potential scorn and condemnation of a class of thirty children usually ensures hat teachers do their job well. Verdi-nine steps, and dozens more

During the 1970s the composer and conductor Pierre Boulez wrote a much-discussed article entitled: Opera houses! Blow them up!"

His view, in its essentials, was that opera, as organized in our time, is a decadent, conservauve, philistine activity unrelated to the realities of the second half of the twentieth century. Since he wrote the article, the French have tended to agree with him in increasing numbers. So the audience for opera has been

This was not what M Boulez had in mind. He was, and still is, against all those cumbersome performances of, say, Aida, with fat people strolling around with Art Deco lampshades on their heads pretending to be ancient Egyptians. Such goings-on were a waste of the subsidies enjoyed by the great opera

I believe that both M Boulez and the audiences that like lampshade Indas are right. Such Aidas could well afford to pay for themselves and the proper place for them is not the opera house but the sports stadium. This Paris has just proved with an excellent series of Aida at the new stadium at Bercy. The building was opened a few weeks ago with round-the-clock cycling and continued with world middleweight boxing though, in an uncharacter-istic failure of showmanship, the management failed to incorporate those two attractions in the performance of Aida I saw.

The various casts for the 16 performances tended to be as strong as one would find in most leading houses (for the benefit of opera bores, the cast I heard was: Dimitrova, Obrazisova, Cossuta, and Vinco, with the baritone being the less well-known, though perfectly acceptable. Giuseppe Scandola. Michel Plasson conducted the Toulouse Opera Orchestra).

The producer and designer was Vittorio Rossi, who has worked on spaghetti westerns. I suppose an lida in Paris is a frogs leg middleeastern. For the beneft of non-opera bores, the "production number" in Aida is the Triumph Scene: the Egyptian army marching across the stage to a very famous trumpet tune. having thrashed the primitive Ethiopians. In the opera house, the logistics involved have traditionally been solved by having most of the Egyptians march around behind the scenery and come back again in exactly the same way, except for those carrying primitive Ethiopian trophies - invariably chamber pots - who change trophies backstage. substituting the chamber pot for, say, a huge shoe horn.

At Bercy, the scene consisted of a vast flight of steps up to the top of the stadium, from a hole at the bottom of these steps processed about 200 soldiers who marched up to the roof, lights playing on their golden helmets. Glorious. Elsewhere. Signor Rossi's production was more conventional. Lamp shades were worn.

And an operatic vista of Bastille and glass

The centre of nearly every capital in the world, it seems, has been influenced, or ruined, by the Francophone Swiss Le Corbusier except Paris, the capital of the country of which he was a naturalized citizen. This is a great source of irritation to me as a native of London, a city which has taken much punishment from the Modern Movement of which Le Corbusier is part, or possibly all. Paris's wise decision not to allow itself to be razed by the Germans in 1940 meant that it did not have to be rebuilt after the war, a necessity which gave the modernists their chance in London and elsewhere.

I was passing the Opera the other day when four workmen emerged to load into a van the model of the new opera house to be built in the Place de la Bastille. Since we of the public had not been shown any of the projected designs, this was a chance to inspect it, especially since there was, as always in Paris, a delay in the loading while the men cursed one another, as to which bit should go first. The design was bold, exciting and full of windows - it is. in short, old fashioned Modern. Lovers of Paris's glories as we all are. I came away rather pleased that the city was no longer escaping

Why Labour needs a pit ballot

For the great majority of people one issue overrides all others in the coalfields dispute: the miners' right to vote on whether they should be on strike. Everything else - the future of the industry, picketing - is

But even Labour's tendency to mistake the voice of the zealot for that of the common man cannot explain the extraordinary way that the party leadership has reacted to the dispute.

It is only a year or so since Labour was convulsed by a fierce debate on party democracy. The fight was won by those demanding wide-ranging democratic change. Labour MPs are now subject to mandatory reselection and the leader is elected by an electoral college representing the entire party.

For Labour, the issue of democracy is vital for reasons both practical and strategic. A major obstacle to the growth of socialist ideas in Britain and Western Europe is undoubtedly the fear of millions that socialism means a totalitarian. Soviet-style society in which talk of freedom and civil rights is a sham.

The electoral advance of a Labour Party with a left-wing programme for socialist change will largely be determined by its ability to convince people that it stands for democratic change. It must therefore by Jimmy Reid demonstrate a consistent fidelity to democratic principles. All such talk and promises will sound hollow and hypocritical if Labour looks away and refuses to speak out when democratic rights are cynically denied to workers within a section of the labour movement itself.

Another aspect which must be troubling Labour is the way the NUM's national delegate conference has been used to circumvent a national ballot. The equivalent of what has been done in the NUM would be a majority vote in the House of Commons to cancel a general election on the grounds that Parliament is a higher body and does not need a mandate from the electorate.

Here was a test of Labour's commitment to democracy. But of the party leadership only Neil Kinnock has criticized the decision to abandon the ballot box. Indeed, the party's national executive has backed the strike without reservation, which must mean support for the refusal of a ballor. Kinnock has argued that a ballot is necessary to make the miners' strike "cohere" and to make possible the level of support from other workers which is needed to win. Events have proved him right, In its ninth week the strike is not yet solid and will not be so without a national ballot. Other workers are obviously reluctant to vote for action in support of miners on strike who still have not had a vote on whether they should be on strike.

All this can legitimately be interpreted as revealing a distressing disregard for demo-cratic norms of behaviour and conduct inside the British labour movement. This, however, would be untrue. In private, many Labour MPs are bitterly opposed to what they describe as "Scargill's antics".

Why then, this contrast between private hospility and a public endorsement so sweeping as implicitly to include the rejection of a ballot? The answer is even more worrying. It is fear, To disagree with Arthur Scargill is viewed by the zealots inside the Labour party as treason, and the MPs are the most vulnerable.

If the party is seen to support or acquiesce with those who would deny democracy here and now to workers, how can a future Labour government be trusted with national democracy? It's no good saying, "Of course you can trust us". Deeds speak louder than

Rodney Cowton on the ructions over top-level defence cuts

Emotions are beginning to run high at the Ministry of Delence. Before long even the stony bosoms of the female figures which dominate the main entrance will start to heave with the tensions generated as Mr Michael Heseltine's managerial revolution gets under way.

Not that he has actually achieved very much yet, as today's Statement the Defence Estimates will reveal. But he has asked a lot of questions, his fingers have probed some delicate and fleshy areas of a corpulent defence establishment. and people are beginning to tremble at the prospect of the surgery which he will obviously demand.

The Ministry has been rather proud of its efforts to achieve economies and become cost conscious over the last 20 years. Long before Mr Heseltine arrived on the scene a senior civil servant could effortlessly tell you the cost of a marginal improvement in the quality of lavatory paper used throughout the services (£400.000 a year, if memory serves). Mr Heseltine, however, is con-vinced that there is a lot of flab still to be found, though it may be tightly corsetted and not easily visible, and he is intent on excising it. And if he has to stand on the patient's corns in order to examine the abdomen, well stoicism has long been recognized as a military virtue. He is focusing particular attention on one area: his scheme, announced in ouline in March, to reorganize the highest echelons of the Ministry and revolutionize the process of policy formation.

The details are now being worked out and will be revealed in a white paper in July, but in essence he aims to strip the Army, Navy and Air Force of their policy-forming staffs, and concentrate them under the wing of the Chief of Defence Staff. who rises supreme and imperial above the individual services.

This has already generated in the correspondence columns of The Times the biggest salvo from the lately great - retired Chiefs of Defence Staff, First Sea Lords and a minister - that has been fired since Sir John Non in 1981 began developing his plans to run down

The viewpoints have varied, but even the most sympathetic to Mr depriving the individual services of lity to offer advice on strategy and policy.

Not only have many of the greatest names in British desence of the last 10 or 20 years joined in this demonstration of fire-power, but others appear only to be biding their time before revealing either outright opposition to Mr Heschine's scheme, or at least some highly pertinent questions. But it is not only the greats of vesterday who are up in arms. There is believed to be anxiety in the Air Force Board of the Defence Council, and the Army Board is furning and would undoubtedly fulminate too, but for the Official Secrets Act and a certain instinct for self-preservation.

Some months ago the Army decided that 1984 would be the year in which it would strap on its sharpest sword and compose its features into their leanest and meanest look. It was going to do its own stream-lining and never again would it be possible for anyone to accuse it of being top heavy.

But that has not deterred Mr Heseltine. The Army now fears that Mr Heseltine's scheme may delay the implementation of its own cuts. and that the two may not be entirely compatible.

All this is neatly encapsulated in the fact that the man charged with the primary responsibility for carrying through the Army's review, Lieutenant-General Sir James Glover, Vice-Chief of the General Staff, is himself in a post which Mr Heseltine intends to abolish.

There is no doubt at all that there is now great anger and apprehension about Mr Heseltine's designs. Whether later in the summer it will Heseltine have warned against lead to resignations or demands for meetings with the Prime Minister it

It would certainly be wrong to dismiss the anxiety as simply that of men concerned with self-interest and career prospects, or, from the other extreme, to argue that the whole exercise is irrelevant because the Ministry of Defence is an undeflatable tyre which will quickly recover its old shape whatever you

There are serious issues at stake, for Mr Heseltine's plan constitutes the biggest top level shake-up since the individual service ministries were brought together in a unified

Defence Ministry 20 years ago. Many people are waiting to see the detailed elaboration of the scheme before forming a view, but others believe that even the outline scheme makes it clear that Mr Heseltine is heading in the wrong

They argue that in recent years the balance of power and influence between the Chief of Defence Staff and the chiefs of the individual services has swung far enough in the direction of the CDS. In pursuing a tidy system Mr Heseltine may be in danger of shutting the door on the best advice, which can often emerge from conflicting interests vigorously

They believe he may be endangering the professionalism and morale of the indvidual services. They also argue that in the Falklands conflict the existing system came through the most rigorous test since the Second World War with credit, and that it is nonsense now to tamper with the fundamentals of a tested Those not opposed in principle to a strengthening of the role of the Chief of Defence Staff will nevertheless require Mr Hesel-tine's detailed plan, when it emerges, to meet some important questions:

• If the CDS is to have sole responsibility for the formulation of policy recommendations and the conduct of operations in war, how are future occupants of that enhanced post to be selected and given the breadth of training and experience to fit them for it?

• Will the new hinge which Mr Heseltine is designing between policy formulation and management of the services be strong enough to cope with a severe crisis? Mr Heseltine plainly believes that the present system of policy formulation is cumbersome and rusty. But there are those who fear that the link in his new system will be so weak that with the first unpredicted stress the gate will fall off the hinge.

How are operational requirements to be determined and resources allocated? The present system in which Chiefs of Staff wheel and deal for resources may be undignified, but given the excruciatingly difficult nature of the decisions to be taken, some fear that a managerially more tidy system will not necessarily be more efficient.

Ultimately what it is all about is the reconciliation of the tensions created by the fact that the Ministry of Defence is simultaneously a policy-forming department which has to get the best value it can out of a £17,000m budget - the second largest of any government depart-ment - and an operational head-quarters which has to have the robustness and the reserves to be able to cope with the most severe test to which society is ever exposed:

The question is, can Mr Heseltine get the balance right. Some fear he is about to reveal the inadequacy of a proach to defence solidarity.

"Local democracy" is different

Discarding the seal of office

The circus poster looked odd, and rather stark. There were a couple of tigers, no prancing ponies, no Madame Fifi and her Amazing Performing Poodles. This was, in short, a circus without animals. The great Mr Gerry Cottle explained in a programme note: "The reason we can't even have a horse or a dog in the circus is that many local councils won't allow us to". Everyone agrees that it is still a marvellous circus. but it is not what it used to be.
You are still welcome to display

You are still welcome to display orang-utans playing lacrosse, as long as you do not do it on council property. For councils may be as choosy as any private individual about what activities they permit on their land. And an increasing number of them choose not to extertain circuses that include so much as a performing flea. Islington much as a performing flea. Islington Council has circulated an Animais Charter and is confident that its fellow Labour-controlled councils in inner London will join the ban, which is already in force. I understand, in places as far-flung as Southend and Barrow-in-Furness. If it catches on across the country, the freedom to present a circus with animals may become purely no-tional since for most of the year all the non-human performers would have to be in ruinously expensive kennels. Thus, in a surprisingly short time, the sight of a blonde on a piebald or a beach-ball on a seal's nose may well become a memory.

Observe the simplicity of the process. No need to bother Parliament. No wearisome bill with clauses and sub-clauses, no need to whip and lobby MPs. A mere resolution by the council is enough. For this is local democracy which is so tremendously "responsive" - or, to put it another way, "capricious" and "irresponsible". If Ken and Sue and Ted have a thing about animals in circuses, then we must all show from parliamentary democracy in another way too. It is based on ownership. The local council tends to enjoy the fulness of power only on land and inside buildings which it actually owns: parks and ponds, libraries and schools and housing parliant. Only on council property are estates. Only on council property are front doors painted red by order. Little Black Sambo removed from the bookshelves and circus dogs banned from jumping through hoops. And therefore the less council property and the smaller the arena for bossing people around, the

The good thing is that other forms of animal training appear to bask in municipal approval. Barbara Woodhouse has not yet been denounced to the authorities. In fact no fete these days is complete without some handler, usually carrying a few pounds overweight, running alongside Rover urging him on over the assault course. At the city's edge, every spare patch of thistles is pressed into service as a riding school. Councils gladly offer their land and their assistance to horse shows and dog shows. The human itch to train anything - dogs, roses, footballers - is still widely regarded as an admirable trait.

How much of it all is done with kindness? Breaking in a horse is not an entirely painless exercise; nor is teaching a child a reliable backhand. And is it the training or the captivity that is objected to? Would you rather be a performing seal or one of Ken Livingstone's newts? I am not sure, and nor. I suspect, is anyone else. If cruelty is alleged, is not the answer to strengthen the law against cruelty to animals in a straightforward way, or to ensure that it is properly enforced, rather than in extinguish a source of harmless enjoyment and employment for circus people who may well be as fond of animals as anyone who has ever said "sil" to a dog

The trouble is that circuses are out of fashion. No progressive tears are shed the day the circus leaves town. If Nelly the Elephant packed her trunk and said goodbye to the circus, the Militant Tendency's animal rights group would applaud her liberation from capitalist explintation. Yet they have circuses in the Soviet Union. Circus people are said to have gipsy blood in them, and gipsies are very much "in". Why are circuses so unmistakably out?

I suspect it is because circuses are associated with vulgar pleasure and with nothing else; a circus is simply a speciacle. It does not arry in improve or elevate us; unlike a gymnastic display, it does not demonstrate the glorious state of the nation's health; unlike fak-dancing it does not pay homage to national tradition; unlike winning the World-Cup, it does not mean We Are The

It belongs to that realm of grubby commercial innocent pleasure which irritates Prodnoses the world over, the world of comics and boiled sweets and Space Invaders and untipped cigarettes and the Eurovi-sion Song Contest. I like to think of a Produoses Union Conference, which would bring together the most interfering sort of Tory MP with the most aggressive feminists and health campaigners: there they would all be preparing more and more ferocious plans for stopping people dows

Meanwhile, somewhere on the Weish border where some sleep, county council has turned a bline eye, the rest of us would be lying in the beather, in a haze of alcohol and nicotine, while all around children dazed on lollies and horror comics waited for the circus to begin. Then would, of course, be lions and tigers and horses and elephants and monkeys. But there would also he parrois singing numbers from the Top Ten and seals in front performing risque sketches, and dolphins diving for corneuos. Later in the evening there would be kangaroo racing

Maybe it's because I'm a Londoner

"But can we afford London?" asked a fellow guest at a dinner party recently. And predictably I choked with outrage over my chilli con carne. When I had controlled myself I charged him with all sorts of reactionary tendencies, the least of which was a desire to tease earnest women councillors. But although I bridle at any suggestion that London, particularly inner-London, does not deserve more economic support, I have to admit on reflection that the question is legitimate, even though the answer may still be yes.

Do cities any longer make economic sense? Their historic raisons d'ètre – ports and crossroads and centres of industry: having been superseded by the new geography of orbital motorways and micro-electronic communication. what is now to keep them alive?

One short answer to that is politics. Decaying big cities are becoming a more and more necessary factor in the party political game. Labour needs them to preserve its support; the Conservatives need them to ensure that Labour's most visible performers are sufficiently left-wing to frighten off everyone outside those municipal

The Government has over the last five years withdrawn hundreds of millions of pounds from the big cities, and now plans, through rate-capping, to ensure that services are further reduced. It looks like - and indeed a cynic would say it is - a deliberate policy to create conditions in which talk of anarchy and confrontation flourishes. One can only assume that Mrs Thatcher is watching with equanimity, not to say rubbing her hands with glee, as one Labour group after another falls under the domination of Liverpoolstyle quasi-revolutionaries.
As for Labour's need of the big cities, it goes deeper even than traditional electoral support. There is also the close identification of the New Left with the public sector white-collar unions. I could not, if I tried, put the argument more savagely than it has been put by one of their own internal critics. A paper produced two years ago by a group of south London Fabians (Labour's Divisions - their social roots: Dulwich Discussion Documents) portrays the New Left as a sort of latter-day colonial civil service children of the middle classes providing themselves with an ever increasing number of jobs by convincing everyone concerned of the utter dependence and incom-

"For a group making its living out of the management of poverty", the author drily points out, "a high and sustained level of poverty is the first requisite". Both these political portraits are parodies. But that there is some truth in them explains why no fundamental discussions on the future nature of cities is being held both sides have too high a stake in the status quo. There is considerable muddle and confused thinking about what that status quo in fact is. For instance, it is common for London politicians to point to the density of population as an indicator of stress id deprivation: "Look at our tightly-packed, problem-ridden areas", we cry; "they demonstrate that we need more resources". But at the same time we are all wringing our hands over the depopulation that has taken place over the last 20 years, with its trail of school and hospital closures. "Look at our dying metropolis"; we cry, "bring back all the factories and workshops and the skilled craftsmen who have left for the new towns. Do we know what we want, or have any vision of what a city should be?

I am not talking about blueprints or development plans; and all that committee fooder that gathers dust in municipal archives, but more about imagery. Throughout history, from the vision of battlemented white towers on a distant hill as in a renaissance painting to the glitter and rancous vulgarity of New York's Broadway in the 1930s, - "the city" has been an idea to quicken the pulse and lift the heart it is a quality of excitement which London on a warm spring evening still abundantly has Yet there is a danger now that the very word "city" will become associated only with negative images: decay, crime, vandalism, racial tension and despair.

To retain, or regain, their magnetism, cities are going to have 10 adapt to new accordance forty of to adapt to new economic facts of life in ways we can only dimly perceive at present. Maybe they will become places people choose to live in because they like gay life rather than places they are they fact that in than places they are forced to live in, for housing or employment reasons. Maybe there will be as much commuting out as commuting in. But whatever happens we natst get away from the habit of mind that sees "Inner City Policy" as a matter of managing a genatric social institution. There is -or could be plenty of life in the old metropolis

Cross my graph and hope to die

Britain's hard-pressed spy catchers are not alone in resorting to the polygraph lie detector to weed out suspects. A small but growing number of businessmen are doing the same. According to a recently retired chief constable, workers steal a total of £300m a year from their employers, and up to a third of all business failures are the result of employees' dishonesty. Some recent polygraph tests:

 A London property developer lost two deals at critical moments. Tests revealed that a member of the staff been passing information to a relative working for a rival firm.

• After losing £3,000 in takings in one day, a fast-food chain suspended six employees and offered them lie tests. Five accepted. The sixth refused, at the last minute. It transpired that he had served two prison sentences for theft which he had not disclosed when applying for the job. He was dismissed.

After an unsuccessful police investigation into the disappearance of valuables worth £45,000, a Home Counties firm used a polygraph to pinpoint the culprit - who admitted much more besides. The examples are provided by Jeremy Barrett, former SAS officer and director of the British School of Motoring, who last summer set up Polygraph Security Services, the first lie-detector firm in Britain. His services have been used by 70 companies, and so far he claims a 100 per cent success rate.

This week he will appear, with his lie detector, before the Commons select committee on employment, which is starting an investigation into the polygraph's implications for industrial relations and employ-

To the accusation that polygraph tests are an invasion of privacy. Barrett says they have to be voluntary, with all questions agreed in advance.

People have to realize the polygraph is not Big Brother, the Spanish Inquisition, or some kind of torture implement. It is a scientific instrument. Objectors seem to feel that a suspect has the right to lie, but the machine does not have the right to catch him."

What is crucial is the skill and expertise of the operator, who has to interpret the change in the interviewee's respiration, blood pressure and skin moisture as recorded by the detector. John Dicker, a retired detective sergeant who trained for three months in the United States last year, is at present the firm's sole expert who decides, from the squiggles recorded on the graph paper, if someone is being truthful or not.

Barrett says: "Overall, a 100 per cent success cannot be guaranteed because one must account for the occasional psycopath who really believes he is telling the truth. But if the polygraphist is well trained, competent and experienced it is near enough 100 per cent as makes

His case for extending the use of the polygraph along American lines, where it is used by about half of all shops, is simple, if not simplistic.

He guarantees that the use of the polygraph, in three different ways, can reduce by 80 per cent losses caused by staff stealing from shops.

First, he offers pre-employment screening tests. More than eight out of 10 people seeking jobs tell lies, he says. Usually they are small ones, such as exaggerating educational qualifications or present salary. But often past dishonesty is kept secret.

Secondly, he provides specific investigations into theft of cash, merchandise or company secrets. Lastly, he offers an "honesty maintenance programme". In effect an amnesty is granted to a company's workforce after which they are subjected to random lie tests to check possible theft. What is bound to concern MPs is the lack of any rules, code of conduct or legislation to control the use of polygraphs in Britain. Mrs Thatcher has specifically ruled out "at present" the introduction of laws to control or limit their use. Barrett suggests that rules similar to those adopted by the American Polygraph Association, which has 1,500 mem-bers, would suffice.

"I don't like the idea of the polygraph," he admits "but it is necessary because lying and stealing have become so common that people are not even ashamed of it. We need it to help people to be honest, as I am sure the vast majority would like to be." Put bluntly, he says employer tolerance is equal to employee theft.

Of course, an individual's right to privacy must be guarded and respected "but the need for society to protect its business, its job security, its hard-earned wages and its health, safety and welfare must be equally sacred" As MPs begin their inquiries they will have to decide if Barrett's

China's claim to sovereignty over Hongkong is in the and incontestable, not least decause the British-held lease on most of the colony is due to expire in thirteen years time. And it is made more acceptable by China's promise that it will preserve the present Hongkong system intact for fifty years after 1997. For this reason the British government is sensible to acknowledge, as the Foreign Secretary did in Hongkong late last month, that "it would not be realistic to think of an agreement that provides for British administration in Hongkong after 1997". The dilemma lies in the fact the government is seeking an agreement that is not only acceptable to Britain and China, but also to the people of Hongkong And a large pro-portion of Hongkong's five million or so people have the gravest doubts about an agreement that would place Hongkong under the control of China.

It would not do to portray the feelings of Hongkong people in black-and-white terms. Most of the colony's predominantly Cantonese, population have a vague sense of loyalty to China, and more specifically to Guangdong province, across the border from Hongkong, of which they are culturally and linguistically a part. And although a large number of them have left China, legally or illegally, during the past thirty years, many have done so in search of economic betterment rather than as political refugees. Nor do most ordinary people in Hongkong identify themselves in any but the remotest way with the British administration there. But the fact remains that most people in Hongkong know enough about how the Communist Party has ruled China since 1949 to worry about their future after 1997, and to want the firmest possible after the British leave. Some of Hongkong's worries and doubts have been conveyed to London during the past week or so by two visiting delegations from the territory. The delegations have represented very different social strata, and have addressed themselves to two very different, but equally important, issues. The first, made up of appointed members of the colony's two main organs of government, the Executive and Legislative Councils, has been pressing for firmer guarantees for the future than they believe the Chino-British agreement now being negotiated will provide. They have asked for an agreement that would spell out in precise detail the ways in which Hongkong's present legal, social and economic systems will be maintained after 1997, and would provide working assurances, of its own inviolability. They also want to see the 2½ million or so holders of Patita million or so holders of British Dependent Territory passports in Hongkong given the right of settlement in the United King-

The councillors? views have been supplemented by those of the other delegation, made up of representatives of students, community groups and other grassroot organizations. This second delegation has been calling for the swift creation of a properly-functioning democratic machinery in Hongkong, so that when China institutes a system of "Hongkong governed by Hongkong people", as it prom-ises to do after 1997, Hongkong will have a sufficiently sturdy democracy to defend its newfound autonomy.

These are all entirely worthy aims; but some are more practicable than others. Many are already shared by the British government. Sir Geoffrey Howe wants an agreement with China in mind.

British officials in Hongkong have intimated that the territory needs to develop a greater degree of democracy between now and 1997. So far the British authorities in Hongkong have been very cautious about moving too fast towards a more democratic system there, apparently because they are afraid of offending Chinese communist susceptibilities. Certainly Peking will only accept democracy in Hongkong on its own terms - that is, a limited democracy, carefully controlled. But the British authorities there should not let this become a pretext for doing too little and too late.

There are other demands which, unfortunately, no British government could accede to. It is beyond the power of any government either in London or in Peking, to guarantee absolutely the course of events in the next century. One can only note that Peking has always been scrupulous in observing international agreements. Its assurances about Hongkong will be given within the framework of such an agreement, and its international reliability will thus depend on their implementation. That is in itself a form of guarantee.

There are also practical political limits to what can be done for British Dependent Territory passport-holders and - while every effort must be made to open Britain's doors to those in Hongkong with convincing reasons to fear the future, or to find homes for them elsewhere - it is better to acknowledge this sad fact than to pretend otherwise. With a draft Sino-British agreement now only a few months away, it is important to strike the right balance between what is needed and what is feasible. Sectional views in mining industry

From Mr Joe Ashion, MP for Bassetlaw (Labour)

Sir. For nine weeks now my constituency of Bassetlaw, North Nottinghamshire, has been a nomans land between the Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire miners.

Children, especially since the disruption of free school meals by the teachers, are living on soup or miners have been arrested and usually handcuffed, imprisoned, photographed and fingerprinted too. I personally was detained by police and refused permission to visit pits in my own constituency on a "freedom ride" to show a busload of journalists what was happening. Yet the Prime Minister, who, on the steps of Downing Street promised to bring harmony into discord, does nothing. It is obvious the Nottinghamshire miners will not strike without a ballot because they work in long-life pits. Against this we have the miners of Wales and Kent and Scotland saying why should a Nottinghamshire miner in a safe pit have a vote to put them out of a job?

What is not generally realized is that coalfields are competitive. The closure of one pit can mean a sigh of relief in another. To misst on a national ballot is as logical as demanding that members of the NUJ on The Sunday Times should have a vote on the future of The Observer.

However, there is one simple proposal the Prime Minister could make to get the two sides around the table. That is to offer a substantial reduction in the price of electricity. It would keep pits open, beip our industry to compete with foreign goods, bring down inflation, and might even gain Mrs Thatcher lots of votes from pensioners.

The savings on the high redundancy pay and life-long unemployment, plus the current surcharge on gas, electricity, and North Sea oil, would easily absorb it. So would cancelling the Sizewell nuclear power staton which we don't need.

We have so much energy in this country it ought to be coming out of the plug on the wall like water out of a tap, with each sector being used to coordinate into an energy policy which is best for Britain.

Yet, unlike any other business-man who cuts the price when there is a glut, including farmers and the EEC, the Government keeps the price of energy high, sacrificing thousands of jobs to provoke punch-ups on picket lines.

Checks and balances for Ireland

From Mr J. E. Hamilton

Sir. Mr Peter Jay's forthright presumption (May 4) that (a) Westminster has the right to act without the consent of the people of Northern Ireland and (b) expressing the opinion that a democratic united Incland is a solution, would somehow lead Ulster Protestants to think constructively seems, to say the least, paradoxical.

I do not follow how being robbed Nationally, well over 2,000 and then being propelled into miners have been arrested and adopting another nationality that you plainly do not want would encourage a single Loyalist to think positively at all.

Peter Jay, having discovered that it is not very rewarding to keep, say. half a million Irish people against their will as citizens of the United Kingdom, seeks apparently to double the error by consigning about a million British people against their will to citizenship of a united Ireland.

The nationalistic link of these half million lrish proved capable of withstanding 60 years of indoctri-nation by the UK. Peter Jay gives not one scrap of evidence to suggest that the British in Ireland, summarily sold off, will not prove as determined, and indigestible to his State of Ireland.

The similarity goes further than this; there is very little doubt that one of the major reasons for the intransigence of the IRA is a beliefthat, as a minority, they were sold short and betrayed by the South. At the time of the Lloyd George settlement discussions in the South centred not upon how to represent the Northern Ireland nationalists but upon the oath of loyalty to a constitutional monarch.

Civil Service pay claim From Mr John Coleman

Sir. In a civilized society it is really unacceptable for public servants to go on strike - at least for more pay. I believe the Government would be wise to index-link the wages and salaries of essential public servants: doctors, nurses, schoolteachers, firemen, etc. This would not be contrary to monetarist policies. indeed it would reinforce them and create additional control over wage increases in the private sector.

If I own a factory those working within it are directly my employees. The fireman who comes when my factory is on fire is indirectly my employee, I want to be absolutely sure he will arrive when I need him and if I know his wages will rise when I increase the wages of my direct employees, I will take into account the tax I pay for him in my

Mr Botha's visit

From the Director General of the Africa Centre

Sir. Your comment (leading article, May 8) on Prime Minister Botha's invitation to Downing Street poses many questions. For example, is it really open to "philosophical disputation without end" that a system discriminating on the basis of the colour of a man's skin is possibly no worse than one that discriminates on the basis of opinions and belief?

There can at least be a semblance of intellectual justification for opposing a person's ideas - governments and individuals to some degree restrict the individual's freedom on this basis all the time but to legislate against someone and to deay him fundamental liberties because one dislikes his hue is unjust unreasonable and inhuman. Similarly your editorial wonders whether there are rational grounds for condemning Mr Botha's forthcoming visit unless one is dedicated to "the total overthrow of the system" in South Africa rather than to its "evolution". You imply that only extremists could take such a view, but I doubt if any decent person could hold back from utter condemnation of a system based on discrimination by pigmentation and which to date has supplied no evidence of a serious commitment towards eventual equality of the

From Mr M. F. M. Evans Sir, If the operation of the net book agreement (NBA) is to be discussed. to bring in abuses of human rights in let it be the NBA that exists, not the other countries whenever South Africa is debated (in your case Tanzania and the Soviet Union) this only blurs the relatively simple issue NBA of myth.

Mr Vernon (May 9) misleads by implication. The NBA allows, but does not compel, publishers to fix a price below which a book may not be sold. It does not fix the discount allowed to booksellers: they are free to negotiate the best purchase price they can get.

There are no such things as "net terms" of discount. The book may then be sold at any price equal to or greater than the net price.

The objective of the NBA is to prevent the strong competing with the weak by cutting prices. But the state of the trade may lead one to doubt that it is what is required to enable small bookshops to survive.

Sir, Welcome as is any news of extensive elm survival, I fear that the specimens of Ulmus glabra your correspondent (May 7) saw on his recent visit to the Black Mountains are but a remnant of what once existed. Thousands of dead wych elm (doubtless mainly glabra) have already been removed from those mountain valleys. Even in the Llambony valley most on the mountain slopes above the Abbey have perished, while the adjoining Grwyne-fawr valley is still full of dead elms. Though glabra stools continue to sprout suckers, one notes that all too many promising saplings eventually succumb.

Mysteries that science cannot solve

By Clifford Longley Religious Affairs Correspondent

The Bishop-designate of Durham, the Rev Professor David Jenkins, is moving to his new see surrounded by more controversy than any bishop for generation, largely thanks to an interview he gave to London Weekend Television in which he expressed hesitations about the church's credal formulae.

Judging by that useful bar-ometer of clerical feeling, the letters page in the Church Times, this did not go down well. Seven correspondents laid into him there, suggesting variously that he had denied the Resurrection, the Incarnation, the Virgin Birth, and some of the Gospel miracle stories.
What the professor actually said, according to the official transcript, is more subtle and more complicated. Some of the adverse comments at least were based on newspaper reports of the interview, thus demonstrat-ing the perils of applying journalistic techniques to difficult theological issues.

A theologian such as Pro-fessor Jenkins is used to saying one thing, and then later another to balance it the message that "Jesus Christ both is and is not the Son of God" is bound to be damaged in transmission. Yet it is entirely orthodox: or, as a careful theologian would say capable of an entirely orthodox interpretation.

On the Virgin Birth Professor Jenkins said he was "pretty clear" it was a story told after the event in order to express and symbolise the faith that Icsus was a unique event from God.
"I wouldn't put it past God to arrange a virgin birth if he wanted to, but I very much doubt if he would.... This statement typifies Professor Jenkins as a fairly conservative modern "liberal Protestant" theologian, not untypical of the Church of England as a whole: and there are distinguished Roman Catholic theologians who would adopt approximately the same position.

This is also true of his belief in the Resurrection; "It doesn't seem to me.., that there was any one event which you could identify" but "it wasn't a question of prople making things up out of their wishes. There was more of a cause to it than just my imagination or Paul's imagination or Peter's imagination." God caused something to happen: it was not hallucination or wish: and "if you'd like to call that a miracle.

What Christian orthodoxy nceds most is boundaries, not unequivocal definitions of what actually ("scientifically") happened. It is a commonplace today to assert that dogmas and creeds are not meant to convey precise historical facts, but fruths of the faith. What actual facts are implied by these truths is open to debate, though it is dangerous to detach religious truth from scientific and historical fact absolutely.

Some "facts" - that Jesus existed is an example Professor Jenkins himself used - are essential to the "truths". It is not so clear that an actual ssome rolling miraculously from an actual tomb is an essential fact, upon which the truth of the Resurrection stands or fails.

There are two modern tendencies, one of them exemplified by the shocked reaction of Church Times readers and the other by those viewers of the original television interview who found Professor Jenkins's intellectual difficulties.

The former is an equation of dogma and creed with the kind of reality described by science: it is quite sure that a film camera trained on the stone across the mouth of the tomb would, on being developed, be found to have recorded the sione's spontaneous movement. And in a culture dominated by science as the arbiter of all truth, it is not a surprising belief.

The opposite extreme 15 to regard Jesus as a good and holy man, a great moral teacher and divine agent who can lead one towards God but not "God made flesh". That is certainly not Professor Jenkins's own faith, but asked the question in this way, is such a person still a Christian?, he replied in his interview "Oh yes. yes." The late Karl Rahner, of exemplary orthodox Roman Catholic credentials, once explained in an article that the statement "Jesus is God". though true, was often taken to something it did not mean (and rejected accordingly). The word "is" was seen as identical to the equals sign in

There is not much distance between Professor Jenkins and Rahner, here. But neither of them would be satisfied if this was felt to conclude the discussion. The mystery of what Jesus Christ was and is remains perpetually at the top of the theological agenda, not in search of a precise solution as if the inquiry was a scientific one, but because the mystery is the source from which the church draws its energy: each fresh approach to it brings out something more.

It is also here that theology and Christian mysticism con-verge, for those who attempt to approach the mystery are changed by what they find in it. To demand that the mystery be "solved" by equating scientific and historical fact with religious truth or by adopting the wrong sense of the formula "Jesus is God", is to prevent the possibility of such change, to have a religion which is cut and dried and dead.

British Rail carries about two fifths of Gatwick's 12 million air-line passengers annually, By the 1990s, when the second terminal is fully operational, the total is expected to double. The airport has processed as many as 70,000 passengers in one day, 30,000 of them travelling by Unsurprisingly, the recently empleted £11m modernization at the airport and station has taken account of those figures.

The concourse is built over the six station platforms; its eight-window ticket office serves any British Rail station. A travel centre next door offers, in addition to its comprehensive rail information service, bookings for train journeys virtually anywhere in Europe, including sleeping car, Motorail, Sealink and passenger ferries, and the Hoverspeed cross-channel service. There are more than 150 check-in desks. (Incoming passengers can put to good use as the usual duty-free shopping. In-bound passengers, once through one of the 20 immigration desks, can wait comfortably in a "buffer lounge" (with pay phones and courtesy phones for car-hire and hotel bookings).

The usual banks, bookshop, Post Office and information desks are open on the main concourse level in the terminal, but catering facilities have been separated to relieve congestion in the check-in area. Above the concourse on the third floor are two buffets and bars, a pantry that sells salads and sandwich es, a 24-hour fast food unit and a restaurant.

emphasis is being put these days way will greatly improve road links, between airports and the cities they serve. This is partly no doubt because of environmental reasons new airports tend to be sited ever farther currently reach Gatwick by rail from centres of population. But are expected to rise to about no doubt too it owes something the realization what a nonsense it is, as the latest jet airliners steadily improve the speed and quality of the flight, that so much of the total journey time can be taken up by slow and inefficient land connexions at either end.

For 50 years Gatwick has been struggling to establish itself as a major international airp while suffering from the twin drawbacks of a poor geographi-cal position - 28 miles from London compared Heathrow and on the opposite side of the capital from the other main centres of popu-lation in the Midlands, west and north - and poor land connexions. Travelling by road between Gatwick and central London has meant struggling through a throng of suburban shopping centres with pedestrian cross-ings, traffic lights and traffic jams for much of the day, while travelling from the northern Home Counties that provide much of its catchment area has until recently been even more of a nightmare. Travelling by rail has been much better, but still, until was in fact the first airport anywhere the world to have its own railway station. But from the time its station started to operate in 1935 it has started to operate in 1935 it has merely been one of a string along the London-Brighton line, using much the same rollling stock terminals, and timetables as the other stopping and commuter services of one of Britain's busiest railways.

That in the face of these obstacles Gatwick has succeeded in establishing itself as Britain's second international

Britain's second international airport and the world's fifth owes much to its sheer attractiveness and efficiency as an airport as well as the steady growth in international traffic through London.

High-grade and air-conditioned

From today however: Gatwick's inherent attractiveness as an airport will be greatly, enhanced by a surface con-nexion of like quality. The new Gatwick Express - fast, fre-quent, and comfortable - will provide the kind of surface connexion it would have had to start with were these things being done now.

Though not completely new, the trains are high-grade airconditioned inter-city stock newly refurbished, with special attention to baggage storage on the train, and ease of access and egress. The trains will run every 15 minutes throughout the day and much of the night. And as a result of a huge modernization by British Rail in track and signalling on the Brighton Line, the interruptions and delays suffered by travellers should be

Without this new investment the railways could hardly have hoped to hold on to their third share of Gaiwick traffic as the airport continues to expand, especially when completion of second terminal will be open. For British Rail, that means additional revenue of around £25m at 1984 prices by the mid-1990s.

An even better passenger service

For that reason there was much talk of privatizing the route two or three years ago, and handing over terminals and trains to a private sector operator who it was thought would put in extra capital investment and marketing and business skills to make it even better than the service passengers will begin to enjoy today.

Although the Government's zeal for privatization of public assets has not faded, this particular project seems to have fallen dormant, and the chal-lenge is clearly open for BR to see how well it can do itself in order to drive away perma-nently the spectre of what the rail unions at any rate (rail management these days is not so dogmatic) see as the "Balka-nization" of British Rail.

Today's inauguration is the second phase of a three-part programme to upgrade Gat connexion, of which the final

This keys in the rail to the air terminal at the Gatwick end so conveniently and closely that it is only 100 metres from the airport Cus-toms to the London train.

The second - to be attended by Sir Peter's successor Mr Bob Reid today – is the new link railway between Gatwick and Victoria; and the third is a new terminal at Victoria itself.

For the present there is no more than a tantalizing glimpse of that for the air traveller in the form of a huge concrete raft just above ceiling height over the Victoria platforms from which the Gatwick trains arrive and depart.

This raft is also the bottom floor of the new Victoria Plaza commercial development carried out at a cost of around £40m by property developers Greycoat Estates.

For the present it is no more than a shell, but the scheme is to fit it out over the next two years, at a cost of £5m-£10m, as a high quality airport con-course. linked by lifts and escalators to the station below and with direct road access for passengers arriving by car and

British Rail is currently searching for a private sector partner to develop and operate the new terminal, which it expects to do in time for completion by about 1986.

In London examples abound like Euston and Blackfriars. And of course the long-awaited Liverpool Street redevelopment where BR will receive a new station in exchange for letting developers erect around 1m sq ft of office space.

As part of the improved Victoria-Gatwick rail-air link, two major office buildings are in the process of being con-structed, although the first, Victoria Plaza, is almost ready to be unveiled.

It is an ambitious project undertaken by Greycoat Lon-don Estates – a joint develop-ment company made up of Greycoat City Offices and Sir Robert McAlpine, With 200,000 sq ft of net lettable office space the scheme features no fewer than three atria and will be built at a cost of £45m. passenger-handling sector of Gatwick, the airport's real limiting factor — its single runway – will remain. The BAA has given an undertaking that it will not build a second runway the land which was originally earmarked for this purpose has, in recent years, been built over for the cargo terminal.

Using the most up-to-date technical aids (a new control tower is due to enter use in early June), and with a highly professional air traffic control operation, the existing runway could handle up to 160,000 movements a year. But even with the present 135,000 movements, there are periods of congestion when airliners queue to take-off or land, and acute problems are presented to those whose task it is to make Gatwick work smoothly when the runway has to be serviced, or an aircraft blocks it.

It is to ameliorate the impact of these last two cases that work on the expansion of the existing parallel taxiway into a runway which can be used in emergencies has recently started.

The taxiway is to be extended to 2,500 metres in length and doubled in width to 45 metres, making it good enough for landings by all types of airliners, and for most take-offs by European flights - heavy, long-distance aircraft will have to take-off light and call for additional fuel elsewhere on their route. The runway will be lit, but not instrumented, and the airports authority is at pains to point out that it will not be a second runway by stealth. It is, in any case, too close, at only 100 metres, to the main runway for the two to be used at the same time

Of the 69 aircraft stands at Gatwick today, 49 of them can be used by wide-bodied aircraft, such as the DC-10s of British Caledonian, the Lockheed Tri-Stars of Delta, and the Boeing 747s of the Chinese national airline CAAC. On peak days, the airport handles more than 600 flights in and out, and its existing single terminal copes with up to 3,500 passengers an hour in each direction, about 40 per cent of whom arrive at and leave the airport by rail. For those coming by road, there are 13,000 long and short-term parking spaces within the airport boundary.

Extensive work on the main terminal has recently been completed. and glass walls are now being installed in the central pier, built for wide-bodied airliners, to lighten the gloomy aspect which greets passengers as they are carried towards their flights on moving walkways. Four aircraft stands are being added.

The new satellite has improved the lot of the passenger considerably, with its modern design, areas of glass, the bright decor. After stepping from the driverless train, travellers are led to solution the Government has their flights by signs in coloured neon, the

The airport authority has also worked on odernising the south pier, the oldest at Gatwick, having been built in the 1960s. It has installed air jetties, through which passengers can walk directly on the the aircraft, at all eight stands so that they can now serve airliners of the modern generation.

believes his philosophy is vitally topical: interview by Caroline Moorehead

Growing struggle against arrogance

With confusion in the coalfields in its third month, there has just appeared a life of Fritz Schumacher, the German economist-philosopher who spent 20 mostly frustrating years of his life trying and failing to shape the policies of the National Coal Board. The author of Alias Papa is Barbara Wood, his eldest daughter: "I find it extraordi-nary that in all this dispute no one has really raised the arguments he kept putting forward - the need to understand what nationalization really means and how in a time of crisis it should involve real debate about the future of energy and the world's resources." Dozens of his papers, she says, neglected then, would make instructive reading now.

Barbara Wood was the third of Schumacher's eight children, and the second youngest of his first marriage. Her carliest memories coincide with a major emotional and intellectual break in his thinking that came in the late Forties and altogether changed the direction and shape of his future. Until shortly after the war, Schumacher was a rigid, personally somewhat overconfident economist, pursuing economic thought along Keynesian lines and closely concerned with money markets.

"Immediately after the war he went back to Germany as adviser to the British Control Commission. He felt he had a mission to rebuild Germany. But being there he realized it was no longer possible. After Hitler and the war nothing was as he had expected. He started believing that education had failed in something fundamental. Coming back to Caterham. where we lived, working in the garden close to the soil, made him realized that there were things in life that were not rational and that couldn't be explained by rational means. From that moment on, there was a different orientation in his life. And that, for me, was why he was a great man; he had the courage to struggle against arrogance, and go for the things behind it."

In 1946 Schumacher became naturalized British subject (though he never lost his German accent) and not long afterwards settled to a domestic

The title comes from an inscripton Schumacher wrote in the copy of A Guide for the Perplexed, his somewhat neglected philosophical statement, that he gave her the day before his sudden death on a train in Switzerland in 1977. It remains true, she adds, that Schumacher's impact is not easy to evaluate. "His influence on people everywhere in the Seventies was enormous - but it was never measurable." The Intermediate Technology Development Group he founded lives on with many people working for it, but ever short of money; a Schumacher Centre was planned but failed to be born; in Germany Schumacher ideas are held by the Greens. "Had there in fact been a Centre", says Barbara Wood. "I'm not sure it would have meant anything. It wasn't what he was about. He was concerned with individuals pulling their weight and making sure the world survives. The system

The Schumacher children themselves have played out their legacy with honour. Between them, the four who are adults have 13 children. Bar-bara Wood's eldest brother is a businessman, applying his father's principles to industrial processes; the second son is a carpenter and trout farmer; her younger sister bottles spring water in Wales.

Barbara Wood read History and Economics before working on low-cost housing for the ITDG. A tall, thin woman with red cheeks and immensely bright blue eyes, she conveys warmth and tolerance. Her six children - the two youngest were born while she was writing the book - are the all-consuming centre of her life.

As I was leaving her house in Kew, full of plants and wellworn, comfortable furniture, she suddenly rememebered a point she had forgotten to make in the book. "My father hated television. I'm grateful now he never let us have one. He used to say that all the feelings of responsibility people have for each other are lost in all that watching. Children forget how to play. Allas Papa published. she hopes now to turn back to the philosophical papers her father left - on non-violence, for instance - and try to reintroduce to a generation of rather unthinking converts to Schu-macher's ideas some of the roots of his philosophy.

Bach was a committed Lutheran, and his music both uses Luther's own hymns and, more importantly, shows deep appreciation of Luther's theological understanding of the liturgy. It was thus apt for the English Bach Festival to put together a programme which demon-strated this influence, but it was scarcely an audience-grabbing event. It was also a little event. It was also a little didactic to provide so bald a sequence of Ein feste Burg settings: Luther's own melody, Vulpius's and then Bach's harmonization. Bach's organ prelude and then his Cantata No 80.

But it was good to hear that famous piece shorn of its probably inauthentic trumpet and drum fanfares and revealed as an intimate, complex chamber work. It was clearly a favourite of Bach's, for he adapted it so many times that its performance history remains very obscure. I cannot believe that the opening chorus, with its very noticeable awkwardness of part-writing, was added as late as the programme note's sugges-

Northern Music Theatre The Place

Northern Music Theatre received high praise at last year's Huddersfield Contemporary Music Festival, and their exciting London debut on Friday showed why. The instrumental playing, guided by the group's director. Graham Treacher, was remarkable for its crisp ensemble, and an almost swaggering confidence surely places the group among the elite in this field.

In Philip Grange's The Kingdom of Bones, the excellent solo soprano. Linda Hirst, actually has very little to do in terms of physical drama other than crouch in fear or comfort her plague-stricken child, discovered in the middle of the forest (comparison with Verklarte Nacht is irresistible). But vocally she requires, and possessed, a rare agility and expressivity, Grange's choice of the Russian language for his text is not as perverse as it may seem: the dark undertones of Shosiakovich's late songs and particularly the Fourteenth Symphony reappear here, and so do some of the musical gestures, like the hollow, monotonous tolling of bells and the biting edge of the marimba's higher register. But Grange's tion of 1723. (Mind you, the crudities of the organ prelude almost suggest that this piece is not by Bach at all.)

David Robiou's characterful direction had verve and style, but he was hampered on the one hand by a period instrument band way below the high standards we are now use to and on the other by a small ensemble of eight voices which, though young and ac-complished, seemed to have stepped out of a Glyndebourne chorus of a decade ago.

A couple of them gave excellent traditional renderings of the solo arias, but together their effect was hopelessly muddy and unclear. This removed much of the force from the superb opening and closing choruses of the G minor Mass heard in the first half. Less relevant was the first Orchestral Suite (at least a Brandenburg or two might have increased the audience size); though it was lively, it had none of the sophistication of the Dutch baroque performances which the Festival so memorably introduced to this country years brand of expressionism remains

Vic Hoyland's extraordinary Michelagniolo unselfcons-ciously inhabits the more garish nightmare world of Maxwell Davies's Eight Songs for a Mad King. Michelangelo himself is portrayed by a mime/speaker, here the impassioned David Sawer, who occupied a central dais clad in a curious leather contraption. Hoyland's texts. which combine the words of Solemn Vespers with fragments of Michelangelo's own writing, reflect the agonizing contraditions of his subject, torn between humanism and religion, Satan and God, his own ugliness and the beauty of David. The music is correspondingly fitful; screnity is quickly interrupted by brash violence, and a male chorus's amplified incantations conspire with whispers or terrifying screams.

Again, the performance was captivating as was that of Kagel's bafflingly hilarious Pas de Cinq, where five male dancers, elegantly dressed in straw boaters and white, parade on a series of catwalks arranged within a pentagon, making the music with their feet. As a sideways look at the way people behave when they pass each other in the street, it is both an enlightening and entertaining essay. But its ramifications probably extend much further.

Il matrimonio segreto

Theatre Royal, Brighton

The fourth and last of the varied group of operas brought by the Warsaw Chamber Opera to the Brighton Festival was Cimarosa's Il matrimonio segreto. It is hard luck on a foreign company to have to criticise it for its choice of a striking and attractive work (and perhaps the opera came as a pleasing novelty to Friday night's festivai audience), but someone might have warned them that London has recently seen an uncommonly distinguished Matrimonio from Cologne

And it was difficult to banish memories of Michael Hempt's acutely perceptive characteriza-tion of this fascinating score from this less sophisticated performance. Its economic set was a group of door-frames on wheels, revolving to show painted pictures, walls and, indeed, doors. Uniformed servants whisked chairs on and off, though they had trouble avoiding the singers in the process.

This is not much to go on, and Edward Kmiciewicz as the merchant, Geronimo, does not have much voice to go or either, but he used it remarkably vividly.

Of his two daughters, the attractive. Kolakowska as Elisetta, perpetually fainting away as the story took another twist, had a firmer touch and stronger vocal line; Krystyna Sierakowska as the heroine Carplina was brighter but less secure in the higher reaches of her part. She was however saddled with a secret husband, Kazimierz Myriak as Paolino, whose slightly nasal tenor wore a perpetual frown of comic

The chief glory of Cimarosa's score is its rich sequence of ensembles, and one might have expected from a chamber ensemble a more acute blending and responsiveness in the duets. And, in the finales, the structural points needed to be highlighted dramatically as well as they were musically by the conductor Tomasz Bugaj and his plucky, sprightly chamber

A market for books of peace

"March for Military Books" was a campaign mounted a couple of months ago by the Book Marketing Council to persuade people to buy more books about war. The campaign had a striking but distasteful logo, of two columns of booted feet marching. Below the logo were the following words: "A Special Interest Publishers Group Promotion". Military books are doing increasingly well in this country at present. The only consolation of the campaign, in Orwell's 1984, is that books about war are regarded, apparently, as "a special interest" rather than

Down the years a great deal of nonsense has been spoken and written about the retail price of books. They are either 100 expensive or too cheap. No one ver suggests they are the price they should be. It was utterly predictable, indeed inevitable. that someone would weigh in in refutation of my piece about the net book agreement as did those admirably serious and successful booksellers. Robert Clow and Willie Anderson of John Smith & Son Ltd of Glasgow, in a recent letter to the editor.

They said. inter alsa, that the price of books compares favourably with a meal in a restaurant. a pair of shoes (sic) or a visit to a theatre. This I would not refute except to say that you cannot, or should not, literally cat books or easily wear them although you can. I suppose, visit your bookshelves. What I would argue with is their assumption that any, or almost any, expensive and/or "scholarly" book is necessarily a good thing. A read through of an issue of, for instance. The Times Literary Supplement makes it clear that too many such books are doing little more than flattering their authors' egos or helping their job prospects. Because of the net book agreement too many titles purporting to scholarship are produced in tiny quantities and priced outrageously. My con-tention is that if the agreement went publishers would be more discriminating in what they brought out, not less.

A bookseller, even more prominent in the affairs of the Booksellers Association than Mr Clow and Mr Anderson, has written to me: "I found your comments on the future demise of the net book agreement stimulating and very much in line with my feelings on the subject. The most important thing for retailers is to recognize the inevitability of its eventual demise - but what does one do one has a medium-sized bookshop in a small town where Smith's already dominate the market so that one would be unable to compete if the net book agreement went?"

Which seems to me the point. W. H. Smith's shops are of a certain kind, most other British bookshops of a different sort. For better or for worse, the net book agreement cannot be with us for ever. Let us have fewer books, better written, edited, produced and marketed, and let the retail trade take pride in being able to cope with that state of affairs when it arrives.

Robson Books publish in September the autobiography of he who was general secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen from 1975 to 1982, Sidney Weighell. His grandfather be-come a guard near the end of the nineteenth century, his father was a signalman, and his brother still drives a loco-motive. The book's title? What else but A Hundred Years of Railway Weighells.

It sounds livelier than most such memoirs, including as it evidently does "entertaining anecdotes of long-disused branch lines". There is an interview with Sir Peter Parker, who gives "the view of those who tried to run British Rail". Tried? But it has made a profit this year.

The autobiographies of trade union leaders are a burgeoning industry: Lord Gormley not so long ago: Frank Chapple in the autumn; and no doubt Len Murray is at this moment talking to publishers.

The inclination of this column is to criticize rather than puff. Nevertheless, I cannot resist providing a word of praise to Longman Imprint Books, whose general editor is Michael Mar-land. Wages the only cloud on the inflation horizon

At this stage in any economic recovery, me British would normally be jostling each other into an inflationary scramble. This past week, the financial markets have shown how ready they are to distrust Mr Nigel Lawson's confident forecasts that inflation will go on slowly declining, and to believe instead in the lessons of 15 years' bitter experience.

Of course, no one really supposes that a government whose one claim to economic success is the conquest of infation i simply going o throw it away. But the argument being fought out in pulic in the United States neatly illustrates the issue in Britain too. Governmets have to set their monetary targets according to guesses about the proption of future expansion that will translate into growth, and the proportion that will waste itself in inflation. As we now plainly know, the Federal Reserve Board and the Reagan Administration disagree about this. This British Government too has to guess at the strength of inflationary pressures in setting its controls, and the markets are congenitally suspicious of optimism. Just the same, an inspection tour of the tell-tale indicators still reveals only one source of real domestic concern.

Pouring oil on. troubled waters

North Activities Nett

Apart from the vagaries of American government, which are giving sterling (along with other European currencies) a hard time, the international signals are set pretty fair. The oil markets are steady, even though world output is rising at an annual rate of nearly 4 per cent - a remarkable change from the last two economic recoveries. (Back in Britain, Mr. Arthur Scargill is learning that economic recovery no longer confers infinite power on those engaged in energy production.) Commodity prices are rising, but only quite modestly by past experience - possibly because the changed pattern of production in developed countries, now more dependent on service industries, has damped down demand for industrial raw

But history provides ample evidence of Britain's ability to make its own foul inflationary weather. So what are the signs at home? That favourite piece of forecasters' seaweed, the housing market, is still not too discouraging. House prices are actually rising more slowly than they did

The borrowing bulge, it seems, is still-squeezing its way out of the tax-advantaged housing market into finance for all kinds of consumer purchases. From the very beginning of this recovery, the borrowing boom spent itself heavily on imports; but that can hardly be taken as a measure of "overheating". To suggest that demand should be restrained to a rate that can be met by increasing British production implies that British consumers buy foreign only when home-produced goods are out of stock. This is what happens in Japan - but not, patently, in

The buying spree enjoyed by those consumers still in work, fed by rising real incomes these past thee years, has not pushed up prices precisely because domestic manufacturers have been constrained by foreign competition. It may be that a falling exchange rate will enable British firms to raise their prices again; but since the pound is not falling against any of its main competitors in Europe, the chances are comfortingly slim.

The real danger area, as always, is the labour market. To interpret its goings-on, it is important to look back at the course of the recovery so far. It has been strongly argued that inflation has lain dormant because the recovery has been uniquely slow - or "steady and sustainable", as the Government likes to put is. Part of this, however, was statistical illusion: production figures tend to be revised upwards as time goes on, sometimes by as much as 5 per cent. Since growth calculations for the most recent period depend on the difference between a base figure which may have been revised upwards several times, and the first low estimate for the latest three months or so, they invariably underestimate recoveries and over-estimate recessions - until enough time has passed for all the figures to have been revised upwards by the statisticians.

So recent work by the Treasury suggests the recovery has not been uniquely gradual; but even statistical hindsight cannot much reduce the depth of the slump that began in 1979. It now appears that the economy has grown at its normal rather sluggish pace since 1981, but from a point uniquely far below the trend.

From this follow two quite different views about the labour market. The optimisitic prognosis is that Britain has still a long way to go; indeed, that productivity improvements over the past three years have actually increased the headroom, before recovery begins to bump into the kind of obstructions and shortages that trigger a cost explosion.

Wages follow profits -not the dole queue

The pessimistic view is that wage inflation was only reduced by the severity of the recession. The slump has left British industry even less able than usual to reexpand production; and so serious skill shortages are emerging dangerously early. On this prognosis, wage inflation is likely to pick up extremely fast.

But neither offers a very convincing explanation of wage behaviour these past three years. Settlements have, in fact, reflected company profitability rather more closely than employment trends. Wage inflation ceased to slow down as soon as profits improved, even though unemployment was still rising; and it has not changed much since, even though employment has begun to rise:

But this is only moderately encouraging news. While it suggests wages will not explode with further modest improvement in employment trends, it means the risk is ever-present. The Government's whole tax strategy is directed towards an improvement in business profitability. So far, private industry has managed to earn about half of the 6 per cent annual increase in settlements out of higher productivity; but will it resist the temptation to finance the next round out of profits instead?

Federal Reserve officials have been taking the opposite course. According to Mr Frank Morris, of the Boston Fed. the Federal Open Market Committee decided in March to tighten policy "and to reduce the growth of banks' reserves. This leak from Mr Morris indicated the Fed is on a course exactly opposite to what the

The agenda for the London economic summit next month has been largely determined by a series of international meetings over the weekend. At Rambouillet, outside Paris. Mr Nigel Lawson and other EEC finance ministers agreed that the problems of international debt should be on the summit agenda, during informal talks devoted to establishing an agreed European position ahead of the summit. Meanwhile, a series of major trade initiatives emerged from meetings of EEC. Japanese, American and developing country representa-tives in Washington.

M Jacques Delors, the French Finance Minister who played host to the EEC ministers, said the importance of placing debt on the summit agenda was agreed unanimously. He described the effect of higher American interest rates as

Come under our wing like the millions who do every year

More and more policy and pension plan holders come under Eagle Star's wing each year and 1983 was no exception.

Despite intense competition total premium income last year reached a record £886 million and the surplus before tax showed an increase of 32.8 per cent at £90.3 million.

In all Eagle Star paid out over £640 million to families and businesses in the UK and around the world, on claims large and small, including our share of major catastrophes.

The message to all our policy and pension plan holders is plain: now, more than ever, you're better off under the wing of Eagle Star.

In his Annual Statement the Chairman; Sir Denis Mountain, Bt., said: 661983 was a memorable year for Eagle

Star... which culminated in the company becoming a member of B.A.T Industries in January 1984. During this period the Board of Eagle Star was particularly mindful of its responsibilities, not only to shareholders and staff, but also towards policyholders...It is B.A.T's intention that...continuity of management will be maintained. We look forward to working with them in the future. 23

ABP (as with British Airways and British Airports) is in a unique position. It is the largest operator in its market and has the natural benefit of its geographical locations in the south and east, It has rationalized its operating structure and successfully introduced new working practices.

Additionally, it is well poised to benefit from increasing trade volumes. Its new-found management freedoms have enabled it, meanwhile, to embark upon joint ventures - most notably the Freeport at Southampton and the development of some of its property that would otherwise have little commercial use. The miners' disruption of coal movements has cast a shadow at the moment - and depressed

Before then, funding had been made difficult for many years by a series of high budget deficits relative to national income. Between 1979 and 1981, with uncertainty over the long-term inflation outlook, the Government Broker had to nurture the market carefully and be willing to innovate.

The tactie was even extended to the indexlinked market in July, 1981. when real yields were pushed up sharply to over 2½ per cent. After November, 1981, funding conditions improved dramatically and the great bull market of 1982 followed. The tighter fiscal stance further enhanced the Government Broker's ability to achieve his funding objectives.

In short, he was able to time his issues of stock (and the type of stock in question) more at his own initiative. One outcome was a decline in the volume of long-dated issues to facilitate the twin objectives of reducing the authorities' long-term interest burden and to encourage the re-opening of the corporate bond market. Although there are fears that the authorities may be facing a return to the pre-November, 1981, situation, both the lower estimated required level of sales in the current financial year and sales of some £1m in banking April suggest that any such problems are liable to be shortlived. In our first article in this series on January 23, we concluded that the bear market in gilt-edged securities that was normal at this stage of the business cycle was unlikely to materialize, that there was unlikely to be a clear trend in gilt-eged prices for much of 1984, but that if US interest rates rose significantly, while the dollar remained firm, there would be upward pressure on British rates.

In the pre-Budget period, the market was on a bull tack while most recently it has been on a bear tack. Nothing that has happened since January has caused us to change our view that the market would be a fluctuating one in which shortterm timing would be import-

He has been exploring for oil for more than 30 years, from Colorado to Haiti, having dropped out of Texas law school in 1953 to develop his first acreage, The job of finding a backer to help finance and develop the site proved lengthy, but successful. He never returned to law school. Over the past couple of years Mr Hickerson has again been putting together his own oil and gas exploration company, PetroGen, which has applied for a quote on the Unlisted Securities Market.

The stockbroker Laing & Cruickshank will be offering 4 million shares of common stock with no parr value at 80p a share. This represents about 40 per cent of the equity and values the entire company at

PetroGen hopes to raise 22.8m from the issue which will then be placed on deposit until Mr Hickerson can find suitable investment ventures in both

America and Europe.

The secret of Mr Hickerson's success lies in his ability to use American tax laws to the full. The technique is simple. Petro-Gen acquires a site which it thinks contains plentiful oil and gas then invites operators and American investors with high levels of tax to finance to

But if the venture proves a failure the potential investors could be investors, or operator, will claim full costs from the taxman and the cost of Petro-Gen is kept to a minimum.

Peurogen has already struck an agreement with Alamco Securities, and independent oil and gas operator in the United States, to finance a drilling programme of $4m a year over the next three years from investors in West Virginia.

PetroGen also has a majority onshore blocks in Denmark manufacturer of computer

Mr Hickerson: Prospects appear impressive.

Petrodan has teamed up with Aminoil, another United States oil company, which has agreed to meet the cost of pre-drilling expenses to the tune of $500,000.

Meantime PetroGen has acquired a working interest in eight wells in the West Wattenberg field, Colorado, from Mr Hickerson, seven of which are already in production and command a discounted cash flow of $5.6m. But it is PetroGen's other projects with Aminoil and Alamco where Mr Hickerson sees the real profit growth coming from. "We want to be as fast into a profit as we can", he leading makes of micro computers, including Acorn and Sinclair, and has been approved by the Department of Trade.

Last week, it launched a new monitor which Mr Tony Martinez, the chairman, hopes will be a winner. The launch coincided with details of its offer for sale on the USM. The merchant banker Hill Samuel and the broker W. Greenwell is offering 7.3 million shares (26 per cent) at 180p, putting it on a p/e of 36. This values the whole company at nearly £49m.

Microvitec was formed in 1979, which means it just fails to qualify for a full listing which requires a trading record of at least five years. But Mr Martinez cannot wait another year for further financing and says the money is needed now if the company is to maintain its strong growth and maintain its lead in the market.

Last year pretax profits jumped from £195,000 to £2.51m on sales of £9.6m. Mr Martinez says it is too early to make a forecast for the current year but is looking for another healthy increase in profits, and confirms sales are substantially ahead of the same period last

At first glance the shares look a little expensive but, if the growth record can be maintained, this fancy rating should be justified. The price should open at a healthy premium when dealings start on May 4.

Godwin Warren Control Systems, which makes parking systems and railway buffers, has been a keen favourite of many USM watchers since joining the USM nearly a year ago at 57p. Last week's news of a substantial increase in profits last year will only serve to strengthen the group's following.

After producing a sizable increase at the half-way stage, pretax profits for 1983 rose 54 per cent to £309,000 on sales up from £3.08m to £3.4m. A total net dividend of 1.4p has already been forecast.

Great rivalry revived as Middlesex and Essex share points

Lord's: Middlesex (2pts) and pull two successive legside fours

Middlesex and Essex, in keeping with their great one day rivalry in recent years, shared a thrilling tie in this John Player League match yesterday.

last over and Tomlins and Downton managed nine amid tremendous excitement.
A crowd numbed by a chilling easterly wind forgot their misery and roared every run as each baisman took a single from Lever's first two balls of the last over. Tomlins snicked a boundary to third man and took a single from the fifth ball. Then two runs were scrambled from the sixth as Downton pulled the ball to Foster at wide midon.

The basis for the Essex total earlier was an impressive display of driving by Gladwin while McEwan, Pringle and Fleether all played forcefully in support. Gooch for once did not seem entirely in tune with himself and was caught at deep point in the last over.

After this the tempo picked up from the moment Gladwyn

Lancashire throw off their cares

By Peter Ball

OLD TRAFFORD: Lancashire (4 Pts) beat Northamptonshire (0) by Lancashire's transformation from worried, careworn uncertainty to confident effectiveness when playing in limited overs competitions is a remarkable one. Having almost contemptuously defeated the power-Nottinghamshire side on Saturday, they yesterday completed a satisfactory weekend with comfortable victory over Northamptonshire, winning with nine balls to spare.

The Old Trafford wicket has occasioned some suspicion this scason, but yesterday it was on its best behaviour and batsmen flourished, But, in spite of the good example set by Wild, who notched his first Sunday League 50, and a breezy knock by Williams, Northamptonshire failed to take full Larkins, in the face of another good but unrewarding spell by Allott, took 10 overs to get off the mark. Later in the innings neither Lamb nor Bailey could penetrate some tight Lanchashire fielding with any consistency.

It soon became evident that the 187 Northamptonshire had reached was not going to prove enough as Lancashire's opening pair Fowler and O'Shaughnessy laid the foundations for their side's victory with a partnership of 92.

Fowler was in his jaunty vein from the beginning of his innings, full of quick steps and bold strokes as he enjoyed himself against some wayward bowling. He was particu-larly severe on Mallender, four fours and a six clubbed off the front foot over mid wicket being largely responsible for the bowler conceding 30 in his first four overs.

O'Shaughnessy was more circumspect, his runs coming mainly in ones and twos and the introduction of the spin of Williams steaded Fowler's flow to slow Lancahire's progress. But the early flurry had given them a safe margin of error, and when Fowler finally was out. and when Fowler finally was out, checking his drive to give Capel a return catch from his first ball. Lancashire only had to keep their heads to be sure of the win.

They duly did so as O'Shaughnessy carried on to ensure that the advantage was not to be lost. He batted with solid good sense, driving pleasantly if frequently finding a fielder rather than a gap, to reach his highest John Player League score. Abrahams lent his usual steady support and at the last the advent of Hughes made sure that there was no panic, with some lusty blows.

Lancaster Park is dropped

Christchurch, (Reuter) - Lan-caster Park, where England's cricketers were bowled out for under 100 in both innings for the first time this century, has been dropped as a Test Match venue by the New Zealand Cricket Council. The wicket was criticized by England in beaten them in three days by an innings and 132 runs.

WORCESTER: Worcestershire (4 spirited and despite the loss of two pts) beat Nottinghamshire by five wickets they managed to get within striking distance of the Worcestershire won this John Player League game with nine balls to spare after Nottinghamshire had scored a seemingly match winning 141 for one. Worcestershire were indebted to a magnificent century off $1 balls by Collis King on his first appearance of the season, the last of his 10 fours securing their second victory in two matches.

The corperstone of Nottinghamwas an unbroken stand of 200 in a mere 26 overs between Robinson and Rice for the second wicket, a county record for any wicket in the league. Each of them finished just short of a deserved century, but the

Stewart a slash off the old block

By John Woodstock Cricket Correspondent

THE OVAL: Surrey (4 pts) beat Glamorgan by four wickets. A spirited partnership of 72 in 12 overs between Stewart and Needham brought some much needed cheer to the Oval yesterday. They tive overs: as the dramatic came together when Surrey, needing 153 to win, were an anxious 61 for four, and they were soon rattling along in a refreshingly uncompli-cated way.

Both sides were hit by injury, Glamorgan being without Ontong and Younis, and Surrey without and Younis, and Surrey without Howarth, Thomas and Payne. Of those who might not otherwise have been playing, Morris and Rowe each made a few for Glamorgan, and for Surrey, Stewart played the innings of the day. Falkner, too, in his first game for Surrey, outlasted both Butcher and Knight and played a decent stroke or two.

decent stroke or two.

Two run-outs set Glamorgan back when they must have had their eye on something in the region of 190. Morris was sent back by Hopkins and thrown out by Butcher, Henderson paid the price of a moment's hesitation, Glamorgan struggled after that, though Rowe hit Knight and Feltham for six in quick succession, the second a fine blow over long-off, and Steele, as the overs were running out, made several unrecognizably hearty blows. Stewart held a nice catch at deep square leg, and Clarke, running away from the bat at backward cover, held a mishit from Rowe that was eminently missable. Richards kept wicket with quiet efficiency.

Surrey win but look vulnerable

By Ivo Tennant

After two days cricket in the Benson and Hedges Cup, neither spoiled by rain, three counties have won twice: | Yorkshire, Lancashire and Kent. Each leads a table. In the other section, group D, likely qualifiers for the quarter finals are less in evidence.

In fairness, though, on Saturday, Scotland gave Yorkshire a run for their money, and Combined Universities restored some pride to Varsity cricket. They lost by just one wicket to Surrey who were lack-lustre to say the least.

bowler Jefferies (it says something for our cricket that a South African can play in lieu of the captain of West Indies) curtailed Nottinghamshire's day. The other match in group B, between Worcestershire and Derbyshire, finished in a tie, the latter winning by losing fewer wickets. Sussex and Somerset, encounter Middlesex these next few days, upon which results the final placings in group D probably depend.

Group A is the one Yorkshire lead. Northamptonshire and Warwickshire, with a win apiece, play each other on Thursday. The latter, where 6 is a control of the control of th whose first game it was on Saturday, beat Leicestershire, thanks in the main to a century by Amiss, his highest Benson and Hedges score. Wrong box of tricks at White Hart Lane

Tottenham Hotspur Manchester United

Some went to White Hart Lane on Saturday hoping for a miracle on Saturday hoping for a miracle but most of us would have been happy with just a little magic. The biggest crowd of the day - 39,790 - did see Manchester United's championship challenge disappear before their eyes, but otherwise it was a match full of nasty tricks that impressed no one.

Ron Atkinson, United's manager, had better reason than his opposite number. Keith Burkinshaw, to feel the anti-climan but he joked it off with his usual good timing and

Tottenham allowed them-selves to be distracted by a few vigorous tackies from Moses and some useful exuberance from Hughes. Before long everyone was more

The game lurched from one confrontation to another while Michael Taylor, the referee wagged his finger like a soft old teacher on the last day of term. England at home in an atmosphere alien to their game

England had the finest night in their history here on Saturday when the men reached the last four of the Thomas Cup, sponsored by Marlboro, for only the second time with a -2 win over Malaysia.

This was a better achievement than the first occasion two years ago at Gloucester, where England heat the same country, because it happened in the Far East in conditions that Europeans find akin to a public sauna in which their game evaporates into a steamy lethargy. The English women, who had already reached the last four of the Uber Cup, won their group by beating the highly fancied South Koreans 3-2. They, too, may equal their previous best achievement when they reached the final more than 20 years ago. Ciro Ciniglio, the English man-ager, beamed like a Belisha beacon as the traffic of congratulations sped acress the arena floor around him. They've never done better than this", he said, He and the team have got their programming right. The preparation period was long enough to acclimatize but not so long as to induce boredom; the team selec-tions have been imaginative; the team themselves have shown equanimity and adaptability.

Almost every player has mastered the knack of taking the pace of the game down a level while ignoring the furere that goes on around and about him. "That gets you all knotted up inside if you're not careful". Steve Butler said, "and unless you block it out of your mind you can lose so much energy from this as from the humidity."

Castleford scored a superbly conceived opening try and led 8-0 at half-time, only to be outpaced and cut apart by scintillating stracking play from the champions in this Premiership Trophy final at Headingly on Saturday. Rovers became the first team to complete the double of championship and double of championship and premiership in one season.

In the opening half Castleford shook Rovers, just as they had shaken Hull last Monday, with a powerful combination of strong running and fierce determined tackling. They got a terrific boost with a superb early try, the ball passing through five pairs of hands, with two changes of direction.

Alphabatim looks a genuine threat moment when Alphabatim left his rivals in the Lingfield Derby Trial, sponsored by Highland Spring, strung out behind him like selling chasers in the mud.

Everyone seemed to be im-pressed: the watching crowd, who gave him a round of applause as he coasted up to the line; the bookmakers who cut his odds down to as low as 6-1 and perhaps, most significantly, Guy Harwood, Alpha-batim's trainer, who finally admit-ted that the colt who acts like a thorough lazybones at home now has to be given a real chance in the Derby.

"He just keeps on improving,
"He just keeps on improving,

two Western Province backs Carel Du Plessis and Serfontein, who, despite being injured, are confident that they will be fit in time. Du Plessis, the left wing capped always thought he was a little one paced, but obviously I was wrong." So it seems were many others, misled probably by the fact that Alphabatim had been put forward as an ideal St Leger type after his victory in last year's William Hill Futurity, a race that has certainly not proved a reliable guide to the Derby in recent years.

There will be those, of course, who simply dismiss Saturday's victory by saying that Alphabatim beat nothing. That is clearly wrong because while Get The Message and Bye Bye Bride, Alphabatim's nearest pursuers, are not top-class against South America two years ago, has been recovering from a broken bone in the right hand and Serfontein, the scrum half and possible captain, did not play over nearest pursuers, are not top-class they have shown themselves to be above average. Get The Message knocked over a second off the course record when winning at Brighton on his previous outing and Bye Bye Birdie had been inched out by the highly regarded Kirmann in Ascot's White Rose Stakes.

The time at Lingfield was very respectable, considering the small field – less than a fifth of a second outside the standard. But surely the most impressive aspect of Alphabapast the others in a few strides.
Alphabatim also proved that a downhill run holds no problems for him. Brian Rouse, his jockey, who now fervently believes that the colt can triumph at Epsom, said that Alphabatim went round the bends

"like a speedway rider".

At five minutes past three on Saturday supporters of El Gran Schor, who had suggested that he had only to turn up at Epsom to win the Derby, suddenly realized that their ante-post vouchers were not money in the bank. That was the horses like him does wonders for a deliverable of the state of the saturday. "Riding outstanding horses like him does wonders for a deliverable of the saturday." rider's confidence. So, the multi-million dollar question is whether the bargain-basement colt with what one eeding expert decribes 28 2 second-class American pedigree has a real chance of beating Vincent O'Brien's blue-blooded champion apparent. The answer must be "yes" because Alphabatim has shown sufficient speed and stamina allied to class and courage to suggest that over Epsom's supremely testing mile and a half he is exactly the sort who could cut El Gran Senor down

Henry Cecil might have a thing or two to say about that, of course, and on Wednesday his much vaunted Derby hope. Claude Monet, will face a searching test of his potential when he faces a possible 15 rivals in the Mecca-Dante Stakes at York. Claude Monet is quoted at a miserly 7-4 with 7-1 on offer against his narrow Newmarket victim, Raami, and 10-1 against Kirmann.

Master Crofter to spark double for O'Gorman

There can little dispute that to be all Jeremy I ree's newcomer Newmarket-based Bill O'Gor- O'goming and Odd Man Out, man is the best trainer of who also showed promise in his sprinters in this country. Like a only start, Adelphai looked skilled racing car mechanic likely to score at the first trate of O'Gorman is able to tune his seking at Kempton's Easter thoroughbreds to reach maximeting but failed to hold the mum revs and fulfil their challenge of the most creater mum revs and fulfil their challenge of the more experi-potential. encod Cameroun by three Superlative is a prime quarters of a length, example of O'Gorman's pro-fessional ability. After a long lenger is Neville C and arduous campaign last season, competing in many of the best juvenile events, Superlative showed he had lost none of his appetite for racing with a magnificent effort on his reappearance in the Free Handicap, losing by the minimum margin to Cutting Wind.

exceptonally well with his two-year-olds so far this season. Provideo won his fifth race from seven outings at Lingfield on Saturday and Stamping Ground completed a stable double with a success at Bath. The 36-year-old trainer should be on the mark again at this evening's Windsor meeting where he runs Master Crofter (6.20) and Adelphai (7.40). Master Crofter was heavily supported to make a winning first appearance on 1,000 Guineas Day at Newmarket, but he ruined his chance by to the second of losing six lengths at the start. In the circumstances this rhesinut son of Crofter did so well to finish a close-up fourth behind the Bruce Hobbs-trained winner, Andrios. With the benefit of that outing Master Crofter is happed

Draw: high numbers best "

Another Newmarket challenger is Neville Callaghan's Phamond, who chased home Provideo at Catterick, while Dimant Blanche must be considered, but Adelphai is selected to add to the O'Gorman tally.

Guy Harwood's Crazy looks

sprinters O'Gorman has also done run when he landed a Bath maiden by 15 lengths. He is unlikely to win by such a handsome margin this time though, with Henry Cecil's Braka — a close-up fourth behind stable companion Alleging at Newmarket last term - and Peter Walwyn's Young Nicholas in opposition.

Richard Hannon's Lily Bank is on a handy mark for the Jock Scott Handicap and Bloadelle, who won at the rewarding odds of 25-1 at Brighton last month, can defy a 5lb penalty in the Dusty Miller Handicap.

At Pontefract, Michael Stoute's Aba Kadra is worth following in the second qualifier of the maiden mile championship. This Blakeney colt ran with promise on his debut behind Fire Bay at Haydock. In the Pontefract Marathon, Physical, who has recently joined Paul Cole's stable, is preferred to Sacred Path after finishing a creditable third behind Misty Halo in an amateur riders' race at Notting-

Double Dealer makes the long journey from Fulke Johnson Houghton's Blewbury stable for the Brocketsbrae Maiden Stakes at Hamilton Park and may open his account, while Pat Haslam's Foreigner, who easily won a seller at the Scottish meeting on Friday, should complete a speedy double in the Newhouse Stakes, Haslam's representative in the Lesmahogow Selling Stakes, Alma Real, may not cope with the course winner Kelly Bay, while Mark Prescott's Haze

Bush, a dual winner this season, can carry on the good work in the Kirkfieldbank Handicap. 499 8070

 THIRD EYE (BBC 2, 9.30 pm) is the television equivalent of a message in a bottle. And the first one to reach us is as anguished. plaintive and desperate as one would expect of any SOS. The vision of Naminia, Africa's Last Colony is that of courageous church-woman Nora Chase, and it focuses bitterly on the illegal occupation and exploitation of her homeland by South Africa. The pitiful sight takes in extreme poverty and children who still get bubonic plague, while the truits of Namibia's rich copper, tin and uranium deposits are enjoyed by its foreign oppressors. And, as the camera pulls in closer, it is a vision in which is reflected true horror. Black villagers tell of brutal beatings, torture and atrocities by South African soldiers. By the time producer Paul Hamann was ejected from Namibia, his frightening film already held two haunting images:

Dr Savimbi said it would "indeed be strange if Britain, which more than anyone else knows this area. were not to play its part as a mediator now for the safeguard of western interests that are also

Sir John said that there had never been any question of recognizing Unita, "We do not recognize movements or, in our case, even governments. We case, even governments. recognize states."

Evidence that Britain may have underestimated Unita's military potential in the past came from two of the released hostages. Mr Robert Jones the hostages, Mr Robert Jones the area manager of the Kafunto mines, and Mr Ian Smythe, a metallurgist, told The Times that late last year Mr Marrack Goulding, the British Ambassador in Lunanda, had assured Britons working in Kafunfo that Unita posed no threat to the lawn.

Letter from Majorca

A beachhead against the high-rise hordes

Where do the wise locals of Majorca. Spain's tourist boom island par excellence, go Light green water laps at nowadays to find a really good beach?

Es Trenc is the answer, the best long stretch of sandy beach still unspoiled on the Balearic island. Thanks to local politicians aligning themselves with changed island public opinion, it looks like staying a beauty spot for staying a beauty spot for future generations.

With its hinterland of dunes, woods and bird and other wild life, Es Trene will, if all goes well with a Bill in its closing stages in the Baleric Islands' regional Parliament, be saved from one of those trained devalopment projects. typical development projects known as urbanizaciones. This ugly word is all too often appropriate for the architecappropriate for the architecture chosen by promoters who have irreparibly scarred Majorca's fine coastline, as elsewhere in Spain, building chalets and blocks of flats as holiday homes.

But while the "townies". like the Palma conservationist groups, reckon they can soon celebrate a famous victory, the local farmers around the dusty old arricultural town of Campos are a great deal less happy.
Many, knowing how elsewhere farmers turned themselves into millionaires, selling sites to construction firms, would be delighted to do business with a big Swedish developwith a big. Swedish develop-ment company which had planned to buy their land to build chalets and flats for 3,000 people – half as much again as the entire population of Campos.

The farmers have a problem which makes the rate of land seem even more attractive .the growing salinization from the sea of what were onece good agricultual fields due to the excessive demands of the tourist industry on Majorca's always deficient water suppy. The problem has been aggravated by three consecutive years of drought. It has not yet come to blows between the farmers and the ecological groups from Palma, but heavy chains put across the road to Es Trenc by trate local farmers were meant to show that if they were stopped disposing of their land as they wish, the "townies" will not enjoy the beach either.

You drive by a few cornfields, some cattle and flocks of sheep and then among towering cactus plants and a profusion of poppies and rocks, but beyond them the beach stretches away for miles till far on the horizon, you can make out exactly he kind of development Es Trenc was threatened with - the high-rise flats of Sant Jordi.

A weather-beaten farmer in his late 60s tells me the basic problem (insisting he is speaking Castilian, but lapsing always into Mallorquin): "The water here is now very bad. The sun comes ans it burns up everything. It leaves us only with the salt.

As we talk a big tanker-lorry goes by, bringing drinking water. None of the old windmills turns any more, for the wells are useless: Es Trenc means in Mallorquin The Breach, where the sea water found an inlet.

Señor Carlos Romero, the Spanish Agriculture Minister, came last August and approved a scheme to carry water from Palma for reuse here by agriculture. However, the farmers are concerned because Campos has yet to see that pipeline being built. "Nowhere else in Europe could a zone of such importance for wild life and natural beauty be handed over for development," said Señor Javier Pastor, chairman of the Pastore Group for the Do-

Javier Pastor, chairman of the Baleares Group for the Defence of Nature and Wildlife.

Nevertheless victory is within grasp against the developers, and this on an island where three quarters of economic activity derives from toursm. Majorca shows vividly how holder of the first chair of ecology at Palma University, grew up in one of those small Majorca fishing vilages later sacrificed to the developers. He said: "Public opinion has been very important, but unfortunately in Spain there is still too little coordinated planning to avoid confrontations like Es Trenc."

He gave a warning how-ever, "We cannot simply prohibit. There must he assistance to the farmers in the zones protected from develop-

Swallows are less common this year. migrants as they passed through the Southern Saharan drought, but the steady demolition of old barns and nest is probably a further reason. Swifts are back in the skies, but not vet round the roofs where they breed: for the moment, they range tar and wide, hunting for flying insects. Nightjars rest all day among the low bracken; at dusk they sing and feed, trilling for up to five minutes at a time from a fir-tree branch, than twisting and darting among the trees after moths and roaming beetles. Rich green, aromatic leaves are opening on the walnut trees. On rab-apples the blossom is turning whiter, as the pink fades from the underside of the petals. The coarse green leaves of ground-elder are spreading at the foot of roadside walls. Blue flowers are showing among the geart-shaped leaves of ground ivy. Lady's smock and garlic mustard (or jack-by-the-hedge") are in bloom: both are favourite foodplants of the caterpilles of the plants of the caterpairs of the orange-up butterfly, and newly-emerged adults are already gather-ing round them to lay their eggs.
